

3 1761 08824594 9

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2011 with funding from University of Toronto

BEQUEST OF
REV. CANON SCADDING, D. D.
TORONTO. 1901.

GYMNASIUM

SIVE

SYMBOLA CRITICA.

G. WOODFALL, ANGEL COURT, SKINNER STREET, LONDON.

CL. Sem.

DEPARTMENTAL LIBRARY.

Lal.Gr

C9453g.2 GYMNASIUM

SIVE

SYMBOLA CRITICA.

INTENDED TO ASSIST

THE CLASSICAL STUDENT IN HIS ENDEAVOURS TO ATTAIN A CORRECT
LATIN PROSE STYLE.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER CROMBIE, LL.D., F.R.S., AND M.R.S.L.

"Audieram etiam quæ de orationis ipsius ornamentis traderentur, in quæ præcipitum primum, ut pure et Latine loquamur; delinde, ut plane et dilucide, tum, ut ornate; post, ad rerum dignitatem apte, et quasi decore; singularumque rerum præcepta cognoveram."

Cic.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

THE FOURTH EDITION, CORRECTED AND ENLARGED.

VOL. I.

LONDON:

2916106
70529

PRINTED FOR R. HUNTER,

N° 72, ST. PAUL'S CHURCH-YARD.

1830.

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

IT will not be questioned by those, who are conversant in the study of philology, that the most successful means of acquiring a correct and critical acquaintance with a dead language, is to employ it, either in composition or translation, under the direction of a skilful master. Nor will it be doubted, that a capacity to express our own, or the sentiments of others, in a foreign tongue, with accuracy and elegance, is the most unequivocal proof of a perfect acquaintance with its grammar, its idiom, and its purest phraseology. A knowledge of the vocabulary, combined with a slender proficiency in the etymology and syntax, aided by a tolerably acute judgment, will enable a person to translate a foreign language into his own, with considerable correctness. Where a critical knowledge of the principles fails him, the context will frequently direct him to the meaning of the author ; and, what the scientific translator executes by his critical skill, the other frequently is able to accomplish by the aid of sagacity, and an acquaintance with the subject. But the converse operation is a more arduous task. In translating into a foreign language, or employing it as the vehicle of our own thoughts, neither intuitive sagacity of intellect, nor the most intimate acquaintance with the subject will avail, without a perfect knowledge of the grammar, the idiom, and the elegancies of the language. Hence we find many capable of translating a Greek or a Roman classic, with considerable facility and correctness, into their vernacular tongue, who are confessedly unable to render, with tolerable accuracy, a few sentences of their own language into Greek or Latin. To clothe Cicero or Virgil in an English dress is an office, to which many may be fully competent; but to render a correct translation of these into Virgilian hexameter, or Ciceronian prose, would surpass the powers of the most accomplished classical scholar.

To facilitate the attainment of a correct Latin prose style, as far as it is acquirable by us moderns, is the principal aim of the following pages. How mortifying soever it may be to our national pride, the charge alleged against us by some foreign critics, that the Latin prose, which has lately issued from the British press, is, with a few exceptions, glaringly disfigured with poetical idioms, palpable inaccuracies, and solecistic phraseology, is unquestionably an imputation, which, without the blindest partiality to ourselves, cannot be pronounced to be entirely groundless. Whether this impurity of diction be ascribable to a premature initiation into the practice of versification, or to an excessive attention devoted to this exercise, while Latin prose is comparatively neglected, the author does not presume to determine.—Thus much is certain, that there is a freedom of diction permitted to the poet, which is denied to the prose writer ; and that, when this licence has been early and habitually indulged, it requires more than common vigilance in the translator, to prevent its insinuation into a species of style, from which it ought to be most carefully excluded. The poet, it is to be observed, adopts a vocabulary, which, either in respect to the words themselves, or the sense in which he employs them, may be justly regarded as peculiarly his own. His diction possesses more of elevation and magnificence, than is suited to the grave and simple style of the philosopher, or the historian ; and, when he condescends to employ, or is by necessity compelled to use, the humbler vocabulary of prose, he invests his words with a figurative meaning.—His language is the expression of ardent feeling, vehement passion, or fervid imagination. The cause he denotes by its effect, the genus by the species, the whole by a part, and conversely ; substituting also one symbol of thought, or perception, for the sign of another, if the subjects are related by resemblance, or contrariety. Fettered also by the metrical laws of his art, he assumes a licence to deviate from certain syntactical rules, to which the prose writer is strictly confined.

Such are the idiomatic licences of the poet ; and, when the scholar has been early and much habituated to these, it is not to be wondered, if he transfer them into a species of composition, in which they can be regarded in no other light, than as palpable incongruities, or meretricious embellishments. In this way, perhaps, we may account for that grotesque commixture of poetic and prosaic idioms, which disfigures the diction of many of our modern writers of Latin prose.

By these observations, however, the author would not be understood to signify, that the study of prosody, or the practice of versification, is either useless, or unnecessary. Though, in estimating the merit of prosodical science, either by the talents necessary to acquire it, or by its tendency to improve the intellectual powers, or by its general comparative utility, the mere prosodian may, perhaps, be regarded as occupying a subordinate rank in the literary scale, yet surely no person can be entitled to the appellation of “classical scholar,” who has neglected the study of this science. To the skill of the prosodian we are indebted for many valuable emendations of the ancient poets; and he who reads Horace without a correct acquaintance with his metres, tastes but imperfectly the beauties of the poet. And, though a knowledge of quantity, and the rules of prosody in general, may doubtless be acquired by other means, than the practice of versification, it must be admitted that this exercise is not devoid of utility, having a direct tendency to invigorate the imagination, and to improve the taste. But still, if we consider, that the principal advantages, resulting from this practice, are attainable by other means, and if we reflect, how few there are, who are by nature qualified to become poets, and how rarely occasion presents itself for exhibiting a skill in the composition of Latin or Greek poetry, we cannot help regarding the art of versification, in its most classic style, as comparatively of secondary importance. Though Latin prose has now ceased to be the general medium of communication in the literary world, to write it with correctness is surely an accomplishment, which every classical scholar should be ambitious to attain. In translating a Greek author, and in critical annotations on a Roman classic, Latin prose is almost universally employed. And nothing, it is conceived, can be less consistent with propriety, or less creditable to the writer, in a work professedly critical on some ancient classic, or in a translation of some Greek author, than for the critic, or the translator, to betray, in every page, an ignorance of that language, in which he undertakes to exhibit his own sentiments, or to express the meaning of his original. Yet this is no uncommon fact. To produce examples would be invidious. The object of the author is not to offend, but to admonish.

In the execution of this work, the author has endeavoured to accommodate his observations, as far as possible, to the capacity of the junior scholar, for whom chiefly this work is intended. In his selection of exercises, he has exemplified the several species of style, the colloquial, the epistolary, the historical, and the oratorical.—He thinks it necessary, at the same time, to observe, that, though the exercises are chiefly extracted from the Latin classics, they are not to be regarded as mere translations. He has abridged the original, wherever it was necessary, in order to adapt the length of the exercise to the capacity of the scholar; and he has, on the contrary, occasionally introduced passages, which might serve to illustrate the critical observations. If, in the syntactical remarks, a few repetitions occur, he trusts the attentive and judicious reader will perceive, that they are found chiefly in those cases, in which, as the experienced teacher well knows, the young pupil is most prone to err.

In the explanation of synomymes, two different modes present themselves to our choice. The one is to exhibit the primary idea annexed to the word, and then to evolve the accessory conceptions with which it is associated. This very often necessarily requires a detailed explanation. The other is to display, and to contrast with each other, the two principal subordinate conceptions. Each of these two modes possesses peculiar advantages. The latter recommends itself by an epigrammatic conciseness, which seizes the attention, and assists the memory. But it is liable to this great objection, that, when the term involves more than one accessory idea, this mode of distinguishing is necessarily defective; for it is an error to imagine, that, in all cases, there is only one subordinate conception attached to a word. Were this the fact, it cannot be questioned, that the epigrammatic mode of distinction, if it may be so denominated, would be far the preferable one, and would be in all cases perfectly comprehensive. But, when along with the primary conception, the word includes several secondary ideas, it is evident, that the complete evolution of these is to be effected only by specific explanation.—Each of these modes the author has adopted, as the case required. And, if he has occasionally differed from some learned philologists and critics in this, as well as in other parts of his work, he hopes the candid reader will not ascribe it to the arrogance of presumption, or to an overweening confidence of the author in his own judgment. Where there is so much scope for diversity of opinion, and so great room for misconception, concurrence among critics is not to be expected, and error may reasonably claim forgiveness.

GREENWICH,
12 June, 1821.

PREFACE

TO THE THIRD EDITION.

THE two former editions of the “GYMNASIUM, SIVE SYMBOLA CRITICA,” were committed to the press, and, in their progress through it, underwent the corrections of the author, while he was subject to the engagements and distractions of an anxious and laborious profession. The third edition, which now solicits the attention of the classical scholar, is presented to the public in more favourable circumstances. The author, however, cannot flatter himself with the hope, that errors are now entirely excluded. To verify all the references would be a task of almost insuperable labour. The general accuracy of the quotations themselves he may be permitted to affirm. In matters of criticism, though his judgments have not been precipitately formed, he again disclaims the vanity of presuming, that, while he animadverts with freedom on the doctrines of others, his own opinions are universally correct, or entitled to the reader’s implicit assent. He trusts, at the same time, that the work, as now offered to the public, has been improved by several additions and alterations, which will not be unworthy of the attention of the classical student.

The “CLAVIS” has been executed with rather more haste than the author could have wished ; but whatever inadvertencies may have eluded his notice, he hopes, that they will be found to be of minor importance.

In the translations, he has endeavoured to adhere closely to the originals, studying to avoid as much as possible that looseness of version, which here exhibits too much, and there too little. With this object in view, he may, in some instances, have sacrificed elegance to accuracy ; but in translation, he deems fidelity to the original to be of primary importance, and this it has been his earnest endeavour to attain. In offering this observation, he must of course be understood, as referring to those passages, which have been introduced by himself ; in other parts of the Exercises, he has rarely ventured to deviate from the language of the classic, from whom the passage has been selected.

REGENT'S PARK,
14 DEC. 1827.

PREFACE

TO THE FOURTH EDITION.

THE favourable reception, with which the “GYMNASIUM” has been honoured, is gratifying to its author, and is most respectfully acknowledged. The present edition is enlarged by the introduction of three new Exercises, with the accompanying Observations, and also by a variety of critical remarks, which, he hopes, will be worthy of the reader’s attention. An alteration having been made in the former arrangement of the Exercises, those, who have purchased the “Clavis,” or Mr. Cowie’s useful little work entitled, “Questions on Crombie’s Gymnasium,” are requested to attend to the following transpositions. The Observations, with the correspondent Exercise, at p. 113, vol. II, 3d edition, are here transferred to p. 248, vol. I; those at p. 115, vol. II, 3d edition, will be found at p. 348, vol. I; and those at p. 122, vol. II, 3d edition, are here transposed to p. 251, vol. I. Translations of these Exercises the reader will find respectively in the Clavis, at pp. 65, 66, and 67, numbered xv, xvi, and xviii. With due attention to these few alterations in the order of the Exercises, the “Clavis” and Mr. Cowie’s “Questions,” will be found equally adapted to the 4th as to the 3d edition.

Translations of the additional Exercises in vol. I, p. 353, and vol. II, pp. 186 and 404 are subjoined to the “Clavis,” and also of the few sentences or clauses, which have, in this edition, been introduced into some of the Exercises.

REGENT'S PARK,
24 July, 1830.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

LANGUAGE is the medium, by which we communicate our thoughts, one to another ; its chief excellence, therefore, is perspicuity. If our words are obscure, the impression on the hearer must be indistinct ; if they are ambiguous, they are liable to misconception ; if they are unintelligible, we speak to no purpose. Elegance, vivacity, animation*, harmony, and strength, are, therefore, in comparison with perspicuity, subordinate excellencies.—These qualities, however, though confessedly of inferior importance, are not to be disregarded as destitute of value. They please the imagination, they gratify the taste, and by exhibiting the object in a more attractive and striking light, they render it more impressive, and thus heighten the effect.—Regarded, therefore, as beauties, they contribute to our pleasure, and demand a portion of our praise ; and as subservient, though not essential, to the great purpose of speech, they possess a still higher claim to our approbation.

* Vivacity and animation are not identical qualities : by the former, resemblance is attained ; by the latter, life, feeling, and energy are communicated.

The several excellencies of style, whether principal or subordinate, result from a combination of the three following requisites.—1st. A judicious selection of words. 2dly. A natural and lucid arrangement. 3dly. An observance of those grammatical relations among the words themselves, which reputable and general usage may have established. Of the common syntactical rules, it is presumed, the reader has already acquired a competent knowledge. To assist him in the selection of words, and the arrangement of them in clauses and sentences, the following preliminary observations may be useful.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE CHOICE OF WORDS.

IN the first place; in choosing words, it is above all things indispensably necessary, that barbarisms be avoided; for these are especially hostile to perspicuity.

A barbarism consists in the use of a word, which has become antiquated, or which, by reason of its novelty, or confined circulation, is not generally intelligible. When the accident, or inflexion, not the word itself, is either obsolete or novel, it may be regarded as an offence against etymology; as Tumultuis for Tumultus, Duint for Dent, Amasso for Amavero, Amassere for Amaturum esse, Jugos for Juga.

Or it may offend against lexicography, either when the word itself is obsolete, as Bitere for Ire; or when the term is novel, and not yet sanctioned by general usage, as was the noun Monopolium, in the time of Nero. When the term or the inflexion is obsolete, the error is a species of Archaismus; when the word, or its accident, is novel, it is denominated Neoterismus.

To distinguish a barbarism in English, or in any living language, we have only to appeal to present and general usage, referring both to oral and written authority. If the word in question, by reason of long disuse, or very recent introduction, be generally unintelligible, it may be warrantably pronounced a barbarism. And if a rule for governing our decisions on such questions were necessary, that which has been proposed by a learned and ingenious critic *, may be safely adopted as correct. In his judgment, every word, which has been disused for a period, equal to the life of man, should be deemed a barbarism; it being fairly presumable, that the word then ceases to be generally understood. For the same reason, a novel, or newly invented word, whose use is yet confined to a small portion of the people, must be pronounced a barbarism. Of the former species, the words Acceptio, Addulce, Bursten; and of the latter Fabricable, Miserism, Petitory—may, in English, serve as examples. Whether the three first may not be revived, or the three last be yet admitted into general use, we have no means of determining. Their admission, or exclusion, depends on circumstances which we cannot anticipate, and over which we possess little, or no controul. Fashion, which usurps no common influence even over our opinions and modes of thinking, exercises a sovereign authority over all matters respecting language. By her decree, words once in general estimation sink into disrepute, and are consigned to oblivion; while others start into existence, and under her patronage being introduced into general notice, establish a claim to be admitted as kindred of the common stock.

* See “Campbell’s Philosophy of Rhetoric.”

“*Multa renascentur, quæ jam cecidere, cadentque
Quæ nunc sunt in honore vocabula, si volet usus, Quem penes arbitrium est, et jus, et norma loquendi.*”

Hor. De Art. Poët.

In a dead language, the case is considerably different. Here the value of the words is fixed, and their character unalterable. Here also we have no oral usage, to which we can appeal.—Scriptory language is the sole authority, to which we have access. Now, it will not be denied, that the practice of good speakers constitutes in every language a respectable tribunal, to which we may refer; nor will it be disputed that many orations were delivered in the Roman senate, which, had they fortunately been transmitted to us, would have been received as productions of high classical authority, and admitted as evidence of classical diction. And, though it would be folly to maintain, that scriptory language furnishes no criterion whatever, by which to decide, what was, or was not, sanctioned by colloquial authority, it would argue equal fatuity to affirm, that from the rare occurrence of any word in written language, we may, in all cases, legitimately infer its infrequent use in reputable colloquial practice. These circumstances, peculiar to a dead language, namely, immutability in respect to the character of its words, and the absence of that authority, which is derived from oral usage, constitute, therefore, an important difference between it and a living language.

Hence a difficulty arises in determining in the former, with strict precision, the character of a barbarism, and in drawing a line, which shall correctly separate between barbarous and classic usage. Is every word, for example, to be pronounced a barbarism, which was not used by Cicero ? This, though the opinion of some critics, would circumscribe the province of classical authority within much too narrow limits. To exclude Cæsar, Livy, Nepos, and Sallust, with several other writers of the Augustan age, would argue a species of hypercritical fastidiousness, for which it would be difficult to imagine even a plausible argument. Should it be objected, that in each of these authors are found words confessedly barbarous, or at least unsanctioned by the other classics of the Augustan age, it may be answered, that, if this objection were admitted, we apprehend, that Cicero himself must resign his authority.

Is every word then, it may be asked, which is not sanctioned by the most reputable prose writers of the Augustan age, to be deemed a barbarism ? To this query we are inclined to answer likewise in the negative. Though Cicero, with the authors now mentioned, must ever be esteemed the purest models of Latin style ; yet to pronounce every word a barbarism, which was introduced and adopted by eminent writers of the succeeding period, would, in our apprehension, argue no common share of critical temerity and presumption.

In the age of Quintilian, it is true, the Latin language began to decline ; but we have only to peruse the pages of that learned rhetorician (not to mention several of his contemporaries) to be fully satisfied, that the Latin language, in his time, presented no unfaithful copy of the purity, elegance, and beauty of the Augustan age.

It may now be asked, What then is to be accounted a barbarism, and what is to be deemed reputable authority ? By what criterion, or what standard, is the junior student, who must rely chiefly on his dictionary, to estimate the value of those authorities, to which the lexicographer may refer him ? To these queries, it is hoped, the following observations will furnish answers as precise, as the subject will admit. In questions of this nature, it needs scarcely to be remarked, that strict accuracy, or logical precision, is not attainable.

Latin authors are generally distributed under four different periods, named, “the golden”, “the silver”, “the brazen”, and “the iron, ages”. Distributions of this kind, it must be acknowledged, are, in some degree, necessarily incorrect. They designate, with sufficient precision, the relative characters of the several classes; but the denomination assigned to each class is not always appropriate to every individual of that class, or descriptive of his style. The distribution before us resembles the division of the year into four seasons, each of which, considered generally, is distinguished by a certain temperature. But in a changeable climate, the character of a single day, in respect to heat and cold, is not always accordant with the general temperature of the season, to which it belongs; and the exceptions may, therefore, be properly transferred to either the preceding, or the subsequent season. In like manner, the age, in which an author flourished, furnishes no certain criterion of his merit as a writer. In the silver age there were several authors superior, in point of diction, to some of the golden age; and the brazen age produced a few, equal to some of the preceding period. But, with a few exceptions, the four general divisions, which have been usually adopted, may be received as sufficiently correct, for marking the characters of the authors, who lived in these several periods.

The golden age is commonly computed from the year of the city 536, to the year 14 after the birth of Christ. But though this period has been thus honourably distinguished, it is not to be hence inferred, that the style of every writer, who lived in it, deserves to be imitated, or even that there is nothing unworthy of imitation in the best writers of this period. Several of them, in respect to diction, are much inferior to many authors of the silver age, their productions being disfigured by words, and expressions, completely antiquated in the time of Cicero. In fact, the Latin language did not begin to acquire any considerable degree of elegance, till the year of the city 560. Of the writers of this period, Terence, Nepos, Sallust, Livy, Cæsar, and Cicero, exhibit the best models, for our imitation. The first, indeed, is chargeable with a few archaisms, as Sient for Sint, Aperibo for Aperiam; and to Sallust has been imputed affectation in his style, while he has been censured also for borrowing a few obsolescent words from the “Origines” of Cato. Cæsar and Cicero cannot be too strongly recommended to the imitation of every classical student—and to these Livy may, without dispute, be ranked as next*.

* It may assist the junior reader to understand some relics of ancient Latin, if we furnish him with a few specimens of the successive changes, which took place, in the orthography of the language. A law of Romulus and Tatius, as recorded by Festus, was thus written:—

SEI . NURUS . PARENTEM . VERBERIT . AST . OLE . PLORASIT .
SACRA . DIVEIS . PARENTUM . ESTOD .

A similar

The silver age is commonly reckoned from the year 14, to the year 117 after Christ. Though the language of the Augustan period is always to be re-

A similar law of Servius was thus worded :

SEI . PUER . PARENTEM . VERBERIT . AST . OLE . PLORASSIT .
PUER . DIVEIS . PARENTUM . SACER . ESTOD .

Scaliger has combined the two in this form :

SEI . PARENTEM . FUER . VERBERIT . AST . OLOE .
PLORASSINT . PUER . DIVEIS . PARENTUM . SACER . ESTO .
SEI . NURUS . SACRA . DIVEIS . PARENTUM . ESTO .

i. e. Si parentem puer verberet, ast illi parentes clamariint, puer divis parentum sacer sit; si nurus, sacra divis parentum sit.

One of the Tribunitian laws, enacted in the year of the city 261, ran thus :

SEI . QUIS . ALIUTA . FAXSIT . CUM . PEQUNIA . FAMILIAQUE . SACER . ESTO . SEI . QUIS . EM . OCCISIT . PARCIDA . NEC . ESTO .

i. e. Si quis aliter fecerit, cum pecunia et familia sua sacer sit; si quis eum occiderit, parricida ne sit.

The first law in the Twelve Tables (anno 304) was thus expressed :

SEI . IN . IOUS . VOCAT . NEI . EAT . STATIM . ENCAPITO . ANTESTARIER . . . SEI . CALUITOR . PEDEMUE . STRUIT . MANOM . ENDO . JACITO . . . SEI . IN . IOUS . VOCATO . MORBOS . AEITASUE . VITIONM . ESCIT . QUEI . IN . IOUS . VOCASIT . IUMENTOM . DATO . . . SEI . NOLET . ARCEREM . NEI . STERNITO .

i. e. Si in jus vocat, ni (vocatus) eat, statim ineipito testem appellare. Si calviter (ab obs. calvi, i. e. decipere, frustrari) pedemve struit, (i. e. fugit) manum in jacito. Si in jus vocato morbus ætasve vitium erit, qui in jus vocat, jumentum det. Si nolet arcerem (lecticam) ne ei sternito.

garded as our purest model, and though its diction is in all cases to be preferred, yet we are not to reject as barbarisms, words introduced by reputable

In the 494th year of the city, the following inscription was engraved in honour of L. Scipio :

HOINC . OINO . PLOIRUME . CONSENTIONT . R .
 DVONORO . OPTVMO . FUISE . VIRO .
 LUCIOM . SCIPIONE . FILEOS . BARBATI .
 CONSOL . CENSOR . AIDILIS . HIC . FUETA .
 HEC . CEPIT . CORSICA . ALERIAQUE . VRBE .
 DEDET . TEMPESTATIEBUS . AIDE . MERETO .

i. e. Hunc unum plurimi consentiunt Romæ, bonorum optimum fuisse virum Lucium Scipionem. Filius Barbatii, consul, censor, ædilis hic fuit. Hic cepit Corsicam, Aleriamque urbem. Dedit tempestatibus ædem merito.

This period is said to have concluded the infancy of the Latin language.

The two following lines are taken from Nævius, who wrote a chronicle of the first Punic war, in Iambic verse, about the year of the city 540 :

“ Quæ terræ Latini hemones tuerunt Vires fraudesque Punicas fabor.”
i. e. Qui terræ Latiae homines tuerunt
 Vires fraudesque Punicas fabor.

A few years afterwards, Ennius wrote on the same subject, and also several dramatic works. The following lines taken from his “ Fragments ”, will furnish a specimen of the orthography of his time.

“ Quanquam molta manus ad coilei coirula templæ.”
i. e. Quanquam multa manus ad coeli cœrula templæ.
 “ Ostia moenita est, idem loca navib' polcreis.”
i. e. Ostia munita est, item loca navibus pulchris.
 “ Tum

writers of the silver age, and adopted by their successors. They must be considered as terms of inferior value; but are by no means to be discarded as barbarous, or impure. Thus Quintilian and Seneca used Irrationalis for Rationis expers; Tacitus and Justin, Restaurare for Instaurare; Pliny and Suetonius, Breviarium for Summarium, though it was censured by Seneca. The wanton introduction, indeed, of any new word, is always reprehensible; and on this principle, to create the terms Restaurare, Breviarium, and Irrationalis, when the language was already furnished with words sufficiently expressive of the same meaning, was a superfluous, and blameable innovation. But, when a new term is once introduced, and is sanctioned by general and reputable usage, it cannot with propriety, be repudiated as a barbarism. The critic may remonstrate against its reception; but, if the suffrages of the pub-

“ Tum clupei resonunt, et ferrei stridet acumen.”

i. e. Tum clypei resonant, et ferri stridet acumen.

“ Heic est illi situs, quo nemo ceivei’ neque hostis Quibit pro factis reddere operæ pretium.”

i. e. Hic est illi situs cui nemo civis neque hostis Quibit pro factis reddere operæ pretium.

From the time of Plautus, who flourished about 560 years after the building of the city, and to whom the Latin language owed many improvements, a more uniform and permanent orthography was introduced. Some archaisms he retained, as mcd for me, before a vowel, quo for cui, servos for servus, with a few others, found also in some posterior writers.

lic be expressed in its favour, he and the grammarian must bow with submission.

The authors of this period, whose authority is most valuable, are Quintilian, Tacitus, Curtius, Justin, Val. Maximus, to whom, but with inferior estimation, may be added, Aulus Gellius, and Pliny the younger. Quintilian, though his works exhibit several indications of a declining language, and the introduction of a false taste, may, in respect to purity of words, be safely followed. His style wants the ease and simplicity of good prose, and is, in many instances, better adapted to the poet, or the orator, than to the philosopher, the critic, or the rhetorician; but the terms, which he uses, may be regarded as classical. The style of Curtius, Justin, and Val. Maximus, is much more uniform, and is free from barbarism; but they are guilty of a few occasional deviations from the syntactical usage of the Augustan period, to which we shall afterwards have occasion to advert. Tacitus, though chargeable with a few poetical idioms, and other violations of the syntactical rules observed in the Augustan age, and likewise Pliny the younger, may be also safely followed, as free from barbarism.

Aulus Gellius, who lived at the close of this period, cannot, in respect to purity, be esteemed a correct model, his language betraying some of those deprivations, which characterized the succeeding age. No term, however, which was invented by any writer of this period, and adopted by his successors, is to be stigmatised as barbarous, though it may be justly pronounced to be of inferior authority.

The brazen age commenced in the year 117, and continued till the year 410, when Rome was taken by the Goths. During this period, the Latin language underwent a very considerable change, its purity being contaminated by the introduction of a multitude of new terms, invented by theologians, physicians, and jurisprudentialists. Some of them, indeed, might be justified by the plea of necessity; but the far greater part can be regarded in no other light, than as wanton innovations. Still, however, they bore the semblance of classical terms; and manifested themselves to be either of Grecian origin, or derived immediately from the parent stock. The few following examples may be produced as a specimen.—Recenter for Recens, used by Apicius and Macer. Profunditas for Profundum, by Macrobius and Vopiscus. Invisibilis for Cæcus, by Arnobius and Lactantius. Unigenitus for Unicus, Gratitudo for Gratus animus, Incurabilis for Immedicabilis, to which, perhaps, may be added, as originating in this age, Octodecim for Duodeviginti, or Decem et Octo, and Novemdecim for Undeviginti. Of this period, no writer can be safely followed as free from semi-barbarisms. Eutropius, Aurelius Victor, and Jerom, may, in respect to diction, be deemed the most reputable. Every new word introduced during this period, though sanctioned by the usage of this, and the succeeding age, may be pronounced a semi-barbarism.

After the fall of Rome, commenced the iron age, during which the Latin language was wretchedly corrupted by an inundation of barbarous terms. Of these, the following examples will furnish a sufficient specimen :—Modernus, “ Modern,”—Sclavus, “ A slave,”—Holmagium, “ Homage,”—Halla, “ A hall,”—Riderus, “ A rider,”—Lista, “ A list,”—Misfaccere, “ To do amiss.”

From these observations, the reader will learn, who are the most reputable prose writers in the several periods, under which classic authors are usually distributed. He will perceive also, that the brazen age may be aptly enough denominated, the age of semi-barbarism; and that, though the words introduced during this period are carefully to be rejected by the student of classic diction, they are, at the same time, not to be condemned with the same severity, as the barbarisms of the succeeding age.

But, though the preceding observations may suffice to shew the reader the distinctive character of the four periods, and the writers in each, who are most worthy of imitation, they may not be sufficiently precise to direct his practice, and govern his choice of words in every particular instance. It is desirable, therefore, to establish, if possible, a determinate rule, by which his selection of words may be regulated.

A barbarism has been defined to be a word, which, either from its novelty, and confined circulation, or by reason of long desuetude, is not generally intelligible. Agreeably to this definition, the term has evidently a relative import, and must be supposed to refer to some precise and definite period. For, in a living language, as has been already observed, a word now barbarous may, hereafter, be introduced into general use ; and a term once reputable, and sanctioned by national usage, may, in process of time, become obsolete and barbarous. Change and vicissitude are indelibly imprinted on language, as on all human things.

“ Ut silvæ foliis pronos mutantur in annos
Prima cadunt ; ita verborum vetus interit ætas, Et juvenum ritu florent modo nata vigentque.

* * * * *
—Mortalia facta peribunt ;
Nendum sermonum stet honos, et gratia vivax.”

Hor. De Art. Poët. 60.

In determining a barbarism in our own, or in any modern language, we naturally refer to present usage; but in deciding the character of a word in a dead language, where there is no similar tribunal, to which we can appeal, it becomes necessary to establish some standard, to which we may refer, and to fix some principle, by which our decisions may be regulated. This, it must be owned, is a task, which is accompanied with considerable difficulty, and involves a question, on which it would be vain to expect identity of opinion. While some are disposed to confine the period of classic purity within the narrow space of one hundred and seventy years, and to condemn as barbarous every word, not employed by any writer from the age of Terence to that of Livy ; others contend for a more extended term, and include the whole of the silver age. Now, it will not be questioned, that the former of these periods comprises the most brilliant æra of the Latin language, and that the style of the writers, who flourished in it, may be justly accounted the standard of classic excellence. But classic purity, we apprehend, admits a wider range. This is a quality, which may belong to diction, where there is neither elegance, simplicity, perspicuity, nor precision. The term, applied to a single word, denotes merely that it belongs to the language, as being generally intelligible, and employed by writers of acknowledged reputation. This usage constitutes its authority, and rescues it from the opprobrious appellation of barbarism. While a language, therefore, though declining, retains much of its pristine elegance and beauty, and while works of superlative excellence continue to be exhibited in that language, the united authorities of reputable writers, in such circumstances, may be warrantably esteemed a standard of appeal, as far as mere purity of words is concerned. In consistency with this view of the subject, we are inclined to extend the period of classic purity in respect to words, exclusively of inflexion, from the age of Terence to that of Tacitus, including a space of about two hundred and fifty years. Within this period, the student of classic purity ought rigidly to confine his selection of words, careful, at the same time, to prefer the language of the Augustan, to that of the succeeding age.

Is then, it may be inquired, every word, which is found in any reputable writer within this æra to be esteemed a word of classic purity? Is the authority of any single writer sufficient to entitle any word to the designation of a classical term? If more authorities are required, what is the number necessary? Is it two, or three, or four? or what number will suffice? And, after we pass the limits here prescribed, do we enter immediately on the field of barbarism? Is every word, introduced by a writer, later than Tacitus, to be stigmatised as impure?

I am well aware, that in answering these questions, as in attempting to fix a precise standard of classic purity, no reply can be offered, no decision proposed, which shall preclude objections. When no distinct and incontestable boundary is either prescribed by nature, imposed by necessity, or established by compact, room is necessarily left for diversity of opinion. To draw a precise line, which shall, without controversy, determine where purity ends, and barbarism begins, we believe to be impossible. From the classic diction of Cicero, to the gross barbarisms of the dark ages, the gradations proceed with shades of difference so imperceptible, that, though the extremes are palpably dissimilar, it is difficult to fix with precision the limit, between barbarism on the one hand, and classic purity on the other. For, wherever the line of demarcation may be drawn, the proximate terms on each side of it, though distinguished by contrary appellations, must necessarily differ extremely.

little in point of value. Nor will the adoption of the middle designation of semi-barbarism, entirely smooth the transition, or remove the objection. All, therefore, that can be accomplished in a subject of this nature, is to approximate, as near as possible, to an accurate and just distinction. Whether that, which is here briefly offered, merit this character, must be submitted to the judgement of the learned reader.

A barbarism is an offence against perspicuity.—The term, in its original import, denotes, that the word, to which it is applied, is foreign to the language, and hence being not generally understood, is, therefore, not to be employed. National, reputable, and present usage, and this only, can constitute the purity of any word. Hence it follows; that no single authority, how respectable soever, can rescue a word from the appellation of barbarism. It will not be maintained, that either Addison, or Pope, or Swift, or Johnson, could have naturalized, if we may use the term, any word which he might have been pleased to frame in the English language. The word must be adopted by other writers, and introduced into general use, otherwise it must still be pronounced a barbarism. What the authority of the best English author cannot effect, Cicero himself singly was equally incapable of accomplishing. So fully sensible of this truth, and so scrupulously careful to avoid barbarisms was this admirable classic, that, when he takes the liberty to employ a new, or uncommon word, he introduces it generally with an apology for adopting it, or with the expression of a doubt, whether the word be admissible.

It is of importance, then, to bear in mind, that in no language, whether ancient or modern, can any word be esteemed, as of pure and classical authority, which is not sanctioned by reputable and general usage, or which, we have not reason to regard as generally intelligible.

In applying, however, this observation to the practice of the Roman classics, it is necessary to bear in mind the three following particulars: — 1st. The works of these celebrated writers have descended to us with many corruptions, and imperfections. Some have been mutilated by time and accident; and all of them have been more or less defaced by the negligence and ignorance of copyists and editors. In justice, therefore, to these admirable writers, it is incumbent upon us to exercise great caution in charging them with barbarism, lest we should impute to the author the inadvertence of the transcriber, or the ignorance of the editor.

2dly. Several of the ancient classics are entirely lost, and the works of others have been only partly preserved. We are deprived, therefore, of the means of ascertaining with accuracy, what degree of currency certain words may have obtained. For aught we know, a word, which is found only in one reputable classic, and, perhaps, in him only once or twice, may have been employed by those, his contemporaries and successors, whose productions have perished.

3dly. Though it may be admitted, as a general truth, that from the rare occurrence of any word in written language, we may reasonably infer the infrequency of its use in common conversation, yet it would be extravagant to maintain, that this deduction must be universally just, especially in respect to those languages, in which the writers are comparatively few. The colloquial diction, and the written language of the Jews, for example, formed a vocabulary, we have reason to suppose, much more copious, than the latter singly, which is the only one transmitted to us, and is extremely scanty. In judging, therefore, of any Latin word, whose purity is questionable, not having it in our power to appeal to colloquial, or, to speak more generally, oral usage, we have no means of ascertaining how far that word was, or was not, justified by this species of authority.

These circumstances constitute an important distinction between a dead and a living language,—a distinction, which claims particular attention, when we examine the diction of classic writers. In English, or in any other living language, no sooner is a new word introduced, than it is detected, and pronounced a barbarism, from whatever respectable authority it may proceed. It may in time be naturalised; but till then, it must be rejected as an alien. Here we have the whole evidence before us. We know the date of the word; we probably know its author; we know, that its use is confined to one or a few individuals, and we can, therefore, decide its character. But can we with equal certainty determine the quality of a word in a dead language, which occurs, perhaps, in only one author? Can we with equal certainty decide, that the word anterior used by Cæsar, or mulierositas by Cicero, were not used by any other writer, or speaker, either of their own or the succeeding age? Or shall we affirm, without evidence, that they were never employed by any of those reputable authors, whose productions have perished? Here we have only partial evidence. And, though it must be admitted, that by this, and this evidence only, we have the means of distinguishing classical from barbarous diction, it should at the same time be recollect ed, that we have not the whole of the evidence before us.

I am well aware, that, as no modern writer is wholly free from inaccuracies in diction, so partly from the natural oscillancy of the human mind, and partly from the conceits or fancies, inseparable, perhaps, from the wisest men, the best of the ancients may have had their inadvertencies and errors. But, when we find the style of an author almost uniformly distinguished by correctness and elegance; when we perceive that he has paid the strictest attention to the purity of his language; especially when we hear him professing, that the improvement of his native tongue has been his constant study *, and when we see him sparingly, and not without apology, adopting a new term *, great caution is necessary, in imputing to him a barbarism, where he himself has not noted its character.

* “ Cum autem ex Sicilia me receperisset, jam videbatur, in me

These remarks are submitted to the reader in order to show, that, without relinquishing the principle by which a barbarism is determined in any modern tongue, the application of that principle may be warrantably less rigid in a dead, than in a living language, where the evidence is completely and easily accessible.

If the preceding observations be correct, the following rules may be proposed for the direction of the scholar in his choice of words.

1st. Words in current use from the age of Terence to the end of the Augustan period, are uniformly to be preferred.

2dly. Any word occurring only in Cicero once or twice, we should deem to be a word of doubtful authority, as Mulierositas, Munitare, Noctuabundus, Minuritio.

3dly. A word, occurring in only one of these writers, Cæsar, Livy, Nepos, or Sallust, we should consider to be of still more doubtful authority; as Anterior, (for which some critics read exterior,) Antemissus, Detrimentosus, Ambactus. (Cæs.) Vis quiequid esset, esse perfectum, et habere quandam maturitatem suam." Cic. Brut.

* "Ut in singulis essent bona media, vix enim audeo dicere medietates; sed, quasi ita dixerim, ita intelligam." Cic. de Univ.

(acc. pl.) for Vires; Famæ, arum, as. (Sall.)^{*}
Mora, for Cohors. (Nepos.)

4thly. A word, not known in the golden age, but found in Quintilian, or any reputable writer of the silver age, and adopted by his contemporaries and successors, may be deemed a word of classical, but inferior authority.

5thly. A word, found in only one or two reputable writers of the silver age, we should deem to be a word of the lowest classical authority. If found only in one, especially if a writer of inferior name, and living towards the close of the period, we may be justified in pronouncing it semibarbarous, even though adopted by writers of the succeeding period.

6thly. All words introduced in the brazen age, whatever authorities they can plead in their favour, should be accounted semibarbarisms.

7thly. All words invented in the iron age, must be rejected as barbarous.

I am fully sensible, that these rules are not wholly unobjectionable, and that they do not comprehend every case, which may occur; but, when we consider the difficulty of defining with precision a barbarism in a dead language, of determining the precise point, where purity of diction ends, and impurity begins, and of finding appropriate appellations to distinguish the various degrees of value and of baseness, which we cannot fail to perceive between the diction of the

* Ennius uses ambactus—and Solinus, antemittere; but their authority can have no weight.

Augustan, and the barbarisms introduced in the iron age, the candid reader, it is hoped, will be inclined to pardon any imperfection or inaccuracy, with which the rules here proposed, may be chargeable.

If it should be asked, whether a barbarism be in no case admissible, it is answered, that sometimes a barbarism is justified by necessity. New discoveries in art or science, new inventions, new offices, political or religious, new coins, new weights and measures, frequently require new names. In such cases, it is often impossible to avoid a barbarism, without descending to a tedious and languid circumlocution, more offensive than the evil, which it is intended to avoid. Who, for example, would not admit the word Transubstantiatio, now that it is generally understood, rather than Corporis Christi conversio in panem et vinum, even if the latter, as is not the case, precisely expressed, what is denoted by the former? Who would not adopt Abbas for an “Abbot”, Parochus for “A parish priest”, Coronatus for a “Crown piece”, rather than resort to so drawling a periphrasis, as would be necessary to express the full import of the terms? A barbarism, therefore, is in certain cases admissible.

II. In regard to the selection of words, I would observe, that no Latin term should be used in a barbarous or foreign sense. Of the numerous stock of words, which we have borrowed from the Latin language, a great part have been transferred in nearly their primitive signification. Thus, we have “To invite”, from Invitare, “To reject”, from Rejicere, “an Hour”, from Hora, “Manifest”, from Manifestus, “Splendid”, from Splendidus. Many have their primitive meaning modified, or in some respect altered, as “Difficult”, from Difficilis, “Petulance”, from Petulantia, “Inveterate”, from Inveteratus, “Candid”, from Candidus. Some have been transferred in a sense totally different from their original acceptation. We have, for example, a “Vote”, from Votum, a “Vow;” “To personate” or “to represent fictitiously”, from Personare, “to sound through”, or “to bawl;” “To intercede”, or “interpose in behalf of”, from Intercedere, “to interpose against;” “To construe”, or “translate”, from Construere, “to build”, or “heap together;” “Discreet”, or “prudent”, from Discretus, “separated”, or “distinguished;” “A copy”, from Copia, “plenty.” To employ any of these Latin terms in the sense which we annex to the analogous English words, is barbarously to pervert their meaning. Yet how often do we find this error committed! In modern Latin we meet with Præcise, “Briefly”, used to denote “Accurately”, “Correctly;” “Dispensare,” “To distribute”, or “To manage as a steward”, used for “To grant a dispensation from penance, or punishment;” Unitas, “Union”, or “conjunction”, for “Unity”, or the number “One;” Compilare, “To rob”, or “rifle”, for Colligere, “To compile.” These are errors, which the young student of classical literature is naturally, from the similarity of the terms, prone to commit. And if he be obliged, by his professional studies, to peruse our modern productions in Latin, it will require no common vigilance to enable him to avoid them.

III. Words purely poetical ought to be rejected, that is, such words as occur in no good prose writer. Nothing is so offensive to a classical and correct taste, as that want of uniformity, which is frequently observable in the style of our modern Latin writers.—To see the language of “Paradise Lost,” and the diction of “The Spectator” blended together, either in the narrative of the historian, or in the grave discussion of the philosopher, would excite the risibility of a common reader; and to a person of taste and discernment, such a grotesque commixture of prose and poetical phraseology, could not fail to produce disgust. In every language, indeed, which is furnished with two distinct vocabularies, one adapted to prose, and the other to poetry, a mixture of both in the same composition, betrays in the author either culpable negligence, or extreme want of taste. It is indispensably necessary, therefore, that all terms, purely poetical, should be excluded, such as, Nubigenus, Edurus, Reboare, Evans, Feratus.—It is equally necessary, for the sake of perspicuity, that no prose word shall be employed in a poetical sense, as Axis, for the “Earth,” Marmor, for the “Sea,” or Meditari, for to “Play on an instrument.” Phrases and idioms, purely poetical in respect to syntax, should likewise be avoided.

IV. Not only should all words and phrases, peculiarly belonging to poetry, be excluded from prose, but likewise all those modes of expression, which are adapted, and generally appropriated, to one species of prose, should be repudiated in every other. Dialogue, history, oratory, epistolary correspondence, and philosophical discussion, have each a style suited to its character. To mix two or more of these different styles in the same composition, is to present the reader with an exhibition, not unlike to Harlequin in his party-coloured garb. A jumble of incoherent images does not appear more ridiculous, than a mixture of heterogeneous phraseologies. Yet some modern Latin writers translate and compose, as if it were quite superfluous to adapt the language to the subject; and as if the simple, but dignified style of history, the colloquial and quaint phrases of comedy, the bold and high toned diction of the orator, with the elegant plainness of epistolary writing, might all harmoniously commingle in the same paragraph, nay, in the same sentence. If they find, what they conceive to be a beautiful, or elegant expression in any author, they fondly conclude, that it must be a beauty every where; and as if eager to exhibit the gem which they have discovered, fail not to display it on every occasion, forgetting the observation of Horace, Nunc non erat his locus; forgetting also, that the propriety always, and the beauty generally, of every expression is entirely relative. Like the purpureus pannus of the above mentioned critic, though splendid in itself, an elegance thus misplaced violates the uniformity of the texture, and produces a species of patch-work highly offensive and disgusting. The classical student therefore, who is desirous to write Latin with correctness and propriety, must study uniformity of style. While he suits the diction to the subject, he must cautiously avoid all words and phrases appropriated to a different species of composition.

“ Singula quæque locum teneant sortita decenter.”

Hor. De Art. Poët.

In colloquial language, Terence is his only sure guide; in history, Livy should be his model; in oratory, epistolary writing, and philosophical discussion, Cicero will furnish him with the most finished patterns. Cæsar, in detailing the operations of war, and in the description of countries, customs and manners, exhibits a style eminently distinguished by simplicity, elegance, and perspicuity. It is the language of an accomplished scholar—of one, who composed with ease, because he was perfectly master of the language, in which he wrote*.

* “ Sed tamen Brute, inquit Atticus, de Cæsare et ipse ita judico, et de hoc hujus generis acerrimo existimatore sœpissime audio, illum omnium fere oratorum Latine loqui elegantissime.” Cic. Brut.

“ Cæsar autem rationem adhibens consuetudinem vitiosam et corruptam pura et incorrupta consuetudine emendat.” Ib.

“ C. vero Cæsar, si foro tantum vacasset, non alias ex nostris contra Ciceronem nominaretur.” Quint. lib. x. cap. l.

V. Equivocal words, wherever ambiguity is to be apprehended, ought carefully to be avoided. If I say, Heri filius ad me venit, the reader, or hearer, cannot possibly ascertain, whether I mean, “Yesterday my son came to me,” or “My master’s son came to me.” If the latter be the meaning intended, the ambiguity would be avoided by saying, Herilis filius. When Cicero says, “A quo cum quæreretur, quid maxime in re familiari expediret,” (Cic. Off. lib. ii.) nothing but the context can inform us, whether he meant to say, “And when he was asked,” or “And when he asked.”

In no way is the learner more prone to err against this rule, than by using the neuter gender of adjectives of the first and second declension, instead of the feminine with res, employing, for example, Multorum, for Multarum rerum—Ex quo, for Ex qua re—Hoc, for Hac re. When an author writes, Victorum arma in ipsos converterunt, it may be impossible to discover, whether Victorum be the genitive plural of Victus, or of Victor. So far in respect to that ambiguity which is created by the use of equivocal words. Syntactical ambiguity will be noticed afterwards.

Having offered these observations for the direction of the reader, in selecting words, I proceed to submit to him a few general rules for their proper arrangement.

CHAPTER II.

ON ARRANGEMENT.

SECT. I.

On Comparative Arrangement.

THE superiority, which a transpositive language possesses over one, which is analogous in respect to the collocation of words, it can hardly be necessary to evince even to the junior student of classic literature. He must have remarked, that in Latin the arrangement of words in a clause may be varied at pleasure, whereas in English we are frequently confined to one order. Whether we say Hannibalem vicit Scipio, or Scipio vicit Hannibalem, or Scipio Hannibalem vicit, the meaning is the same. But if we say, “Scipio conquered Hannibal,” we state the fact. If we alter the order and say, “Hannibal conquered Scipio,” we affirm the reverse; and if we say, “Scipio Hannibal conquered,” or “Hannibal Scipio conquered,” we state an ambiguous proposition.

When I say, that the meaning is the same, in whatever order the Latin words may be arranged, I would not be understood to signify, that the three forms may in all cases be indiscriminately adopted, without in the least degree hurting the sentiment, or that in all instances they are equally apposite.—My observation regards solely the expression of the primary sentiment. To illustrate the difference, let us take the following example,—Ad Arbela Darium vicit Alexander. If the question were, “Who conquered Darius?” the answer should be, Alexander ad Arbela Darium vicit. If the question were, “Whom did Alexander conquer?” it should be answered, Darium ad Arbela Alexander vicit. If it were inquired, “Where did Alexander conquer Darius?” the answer should be, Ad Arbela Alexander Darium vicit. If the question were, “Did Alexander take, or did he conquer Darius?” the answer would be, Vicit Darium Alexander. The natural anxiety of the speaker to satisfy the curiosity of the inquirer would, in these several circumstances, dictate the correspondent arrangement.

Our collocation, in English, generally considered, has been aptly enough denominated, the order of intellect. The arrangement in Latin is more adapted to imagination and feeling. The language of the Romans consists of periods; ours is composed of sentences. Hence the English has more simplicity; the Latin greater strength. We begin with the agent, from him we proceed to the act, and from it to the person, or thing acted upon.—This may be called the metaphysical order; it is the order of time, and to this arrangement we are generally confined. The flexibility of the Latin language enabled the speaker or writer to adopt any collocation, which the subject prescribed, or which he deemed conducive to the attainment of his purpose. If the subject was familiar, and the language colloquial, it approached pretty nearly to the English arrangement. Thus,

“Continuo ad te properans, percurso ad forum, ut dicam tibi
haec :

Ubi te non invenio, ibi ascendo in quendam excelsum locum :
Circumspicio ; nusquam. Forte ibi hujus video Byrrhiam ;
Rogo ; negat vidisse.”

Ter. And. ii. 2, 19.

If the style be didactic, or the subject historical, it is, according to our conceptions of natural order, more inverted. Thus, “ Ubi eo ventum est, qua- cunque incedit, armata multitudo pavorem ac tumultum facit ; rursus ubi anteire primores civitatis vident, quicquid sit, haud temere esse rentur. Nec minorem motum animorum Romæ tam atrox res facit, quam Collatiae fecerat. Ergo ex omnibus locis urbis in forum curritur.” Liv. i. 59.

If the language be addressed to the feelings, or the imagination chiefly, the arrangement is nearly the reverse of ours. Here the Latin order possesses a most decided superiority. The most conspicuous words in every sentence, it is to be observed, are the first and the last. By the former, our attention is excited; and on the latter it rests.

Hence, if the speaker were reasoning on his arrangement, he might conclude it to be a matter of indifference, whether he placed the chief image, which he was to present to his auditory, in the very beginning, or at the very end of the sentence. But under the influence of vehement passion, his ardent mind stops not to reason. The object, be it what it may, which most forcibly affects his feelings, or seizes his imagination, that he first presents to his auditory. The following passage from Cicero, while it exemplifies this observation, will serve also to illustrate the difference between the Latin and English arrangement in oratorical language.—“Rempublicam, Quirites, vitamque omnium vestrūm, bona, fortunas, conjuges, liberosque vestros, atque hoc domicilium clarissimi imperii fortunatissimam pulcherrimamque urbem, hodierno die, deorum immortalium summo erga vos amore, laboribus, consiliis, periculisque meis, ex flamma atque ferro, ac pæne ex faucibus fati ereptam, et vobis conservatam ac restitutam, videtis.” Orat. in Cat. It is impossible to conceive a period more perspicuously, more beautifully, more impressively constructed than the preceding. Not a clause can be transposed, not a word displaced without violence to the beauty, the strength, or the harmony of the period. He first seizes the attention by presenting an image, above all others interesting to a Roman auditory—Rempublicam. He then proceeds to enumerate a series of objects, calculated in succession to awaken in the breasts of his hearers the most lively emotions.—“Vitam,” “bona,” “fortunas,” “conjuges,” “liberosque.” Then he completes the group, by exhibiting an object endeared to them all by a thousand ties—"the city of Rome," "the capital of the empire," "the mistress of nations." Still suspending the interest of his auditory, and postponing the statement of the important and interesting fact, he proceeds to specify the means, by which it was accomplished. Then, after directing their attention to the benign interposition of the immortal gods, as the great authors of the event, he finishes the picture by exhibiting the whole, as rescued that day from conflagration, and impending destruction.—Let the reader now compare the original with the translation. "Today, Romans, you behold the commonwealth, your lives, estates, fortunes, your wives and children, the seat of this most renowned empire, this most fair and flourishing city, preserved and restored to you from fire and sword, and almost snatched from the jaws of fate, by the distinguished love of the immortal gods towards you, and by my toils, counsels, and dangers."

It has been matter of controversy, whether the arrangement, which obtains in transpositive, or that which is found in analogous languages, should be deemed the natural order. The Abbé Batteux *, who is in this followed by another eminent French critic, contends, that the order in French, and consequently in all analogous languages, is the inverted order; and that the arrangement of words in Latin, and, therefore, in all transpositive languages, is the natural arrangement. In this doctrine, as very generally correct, I am inclined to concur ; and if we are careful to distinguish between the effect of habit, and the dictates of pure nature, the subject, it is presumed, can scarcely admit dispute.

* See "Principes de la Literature," par M. l'Abbé Batteux, vol. iv. p. 10.

If by “natural order” be understood, that order, which is consentaneous with our habits and constant associations, the question is purely relative ; and that order must be conceived to be the most natural, to which we have been most habituated.—The Hebrew, the Latin, the English, and the French, all differ in respect to arrangement ; yet we may be assured, that the order in the two languages first mentioned, appeared as natural to the Jews and Romans, as the arrangement in English appears to us. This position, it is presumed, is too evident to require proof, as it is too plain to need illustration.

But if the term “natural” be taken absolutely, without any reference to the usage of this or that country, it is of importance to determine the criterion, by which we may decide, which of the two arrangements is, in truth, the more natural.

There are not, perhaps, any two languages, which precisely agree one with the other, in respect to the collocation of words. Various, however, as the modes of arrangement are found to be, we believe they may be comprehended under one, or other, of the five following denominations. 1st. The grammatical : 2dly. The metaphysical : 3dly. The oratorical : 4thly. The conventional : and, 5thly. The idiomatical. These simple modes of arrangement, however, may be variously modified and combined. According to the grammatical arrangement, the governing word should precede, and the word governed by it should follow, the thing determining naturally going before the thing determined. It is this collocation which obtains chiefly in the English language. It may be illustrated by the following example.—“Alexander, the son of Philip, conquered Darius, a brave man, and king of the Persians,” Alexander, filius Philippi, vicit Darium strenuum virum, et regem Persarum.

While the grammarian considers the dependance of one word upon another, in respect to concord and government, the metaphysician regards the relation, which the objects themselves, and not their signs, bear to each other. He contemplates them as connected by the relation of cause and effect, substance and mode, action and passion. Agreeably, therefore, to the metaphysical arrangement, the agent or efficient cause of the action, as necessarily existing before its effect, is first mentioned; then the action itself, as necessarily antecedent to its effect, is next expressed; and then the effect produced, or the person acted upon, concludes the sentence. Agreeably to this arrangement, the sentiment would be thus exhibited,— Alexander, Philippi filius, vicit Darium virum strenuum, et Persarum regem. These two modes of collocation, the reader will perceive, are nearly coincident with each other; they have, therefore, been comprehended by several critics, under one general denomination, being termed by some the “metaphysical arrangement," and by others, the "order of intellect." The principle of their affinity, did our limits permit, it would be easy to explain.

The oratorical arrangement is governed by principles entirely dissimilar. It respects neither the metaphysical relations subsisting among the objects of perception, nor the grammatical dependance of their signs on one another. It neither proceeds from the intellect, nor does it aim at instruction.—It is dictated solely by the imagination, and by the feelings, the passions, the appetites of our nature. From them it proceeds, and to them it is addressed. Its purpose is, not merely to present to the mind certain objects of contemplation, but to exhibit them in the most attractive and impressive light.—The painter, while he presents a group of figures to the eye, is careful to impart to each a degree of prominence, suited to his conception of its comparative importance. The orator, in like manner, when he presents an assemblage of ideas to the imagination, assigns to each image that rank in the sentence, which its relative character demands, as subservient to the production of the intended effect. This mode of arrangement has been already exemplified in our quotation from Cicero's third oration against Catiline.

The 4th mode of arrangement has been termed the conventional. This variety of collocation is not dictated by any regard to syntactical construction, nor is it derived from any principles in our mental constitution. It is founded in usage, and general consent.

Examples of this arrangement are to be found in almost every language, with which we are acquainted. In English, for instance, we generally place the adjective before the substantive. This usage is purely conventional. The French, on the contrary, frequently place the adjective after its noun. We say, for example, “A rich man”; they say, Un homme riche: we say, “The Roman empire”; they say, L'Empire Romain.

The 5th mode of arrangement may be named the idiomatical, as necessarily resulting from the peculiar structure of the language. It obtains chiefly, if not solely, in those languages, whose nouns and verbs admit few or no inflections. In English, for example, the nominative and the objective case of all our substantives, are identically the same; it is, therefore, by the collocation only, that we can distinguish the agent from the patient, the cause from the effect. If the collocation is inverted, the sentiment is reversed. “Isaac begat Jacob”, and “Jacob begat Isaac”, express two contrary propositions. Our arrangement, therefore, is here indiscretionary and unalterable; it arises from the peculiar structure of the language. The adjective also, in like manner, uniformly, and the relative pronoun frequently, the former being wholly inflexible, and the latter admitting only four changes of termination, must be placed as near as possible to the substantive, to which they belong. This collocation is essential to perspicuity.

Of these modes of arrangement, it is obvious, that the metaphysical and the oratorical are the only two, which bear any relation to the subject in question. The others, originating evidently either in convention, usage, or the idiomatical structure of the language, appear to have no connection, either immediate or remote, with any innate principle, in the constitution of the human mind.

Now, it will not be disputed, that, if man were purely an intellectual being, the metaphysical arrangement would be that, which his words would most probably assume ; for, though in his philosophical investigations, he must ascend from effects to causes, yet as following the order of his perceptions, which is the order of the phenomena around him, he would naturally first express the cause, as being necessarily antecedent to its effect. But pure intelligence is not the character of man. He is endowed with imagination, with appetites also, and passions too prone to seize, with heedless avidity, whatever object is conceived to be subservient to their gratification. And is it not proved by experience, nay, has it not grown into a common adage, that whatever the heart most eagerly covets, the tongue is always most impatient to express ? “ Arma, viri, ferte arma ”, was the language of Æneas in a moment of peril. “ A horse, a horse, a kingdom for a horse ”, was the exclamation of Richard the Third, in the instant of alarm. This is the language of passion.

Imagination is, likewise, in most minds a powerful, and in some a predominant, faculty. When a group of ideas are presented to its view, it uniformly seizes the most interesting object, and whatever forcibly fixes its attention, it prompts the tongue instantaneously to utter. We are informed, that the Emperor Domitian was wont to amuse himself with causing a boy to stand at some distance from him, with his hand lifted up, the palm open, and the fingers distended, and with shooting arrows between the fingers of the boy, thus placed as a mark.—Now, in picturing to ourselves this scene, which is the more interesting object ? The tyrant, or the boy ? The latter unquestionably. It is this object, accordingly, which the historian first presents to the imagination of his reader. “ In pueri procul stantis, præbentisque pro scopulo dispansam dextræ manus palmam, sagittas tanta arte direxit, ut omnes per intervalla digitorum innocue evaderent.” Suet. in Domit. cap. 19. The grammatical and metaphysical modes of collocation, here, as in most other cases pretty nearly coincident, would be the very reverse of that order, which the biographer has, in this instance, very appositely adopted.

Now, it is to be observed, that each of the two contrary arrangements, the metaphysical, and the oratorical, has its appropriate place ; each is in certain circumstances preferable to the other. When we express the calm dictates of reason, and when we utter the vehement language of the heart, we naturally adopt different words, and a different collocation. The starving wretch, beholding a piece of bread, would not say, Da mihi panem, but Panem mihi da. This is the natural order—the order, in fact, which, if the language permitted, the feelings of every man would irresistibly prescribe. When Nisus, in his impatient eagerness to save the life of his friend, exclaimed,

“ Me, me, adsum qui feci, in me convertite ferrum.”

Virg. Aen. ix. 427.

he spoke a language, consentaneous to his feelings in a moment of the most agonizing apprehension. Nay, any other arrangement of his words would have been less natural, because less accordant with that paroxysm of terror, which he felt for the safety of his bosom friend, Euryalus. Place him in calmer circumstances, and he might have said, “ Ego adsum, qui feci; convertite ferrum in me.” Each of these arrangements, therefore, may be said to be natural, each being adapted to certain states of mind, and accommodated to the operation of certain principles, clearly inseparable from the constitution of our nature. It is the latter of these, to which the English language is almost wholly confined. Inversion, as we term it, is among us but rarely practicable. In Latin, on the contrary, the variety of termination in nouns and verbs, enables the writer or speaker to place the words in whatever order, his reason, his feelings, or his imagination may suggest. Its flexibility, therefore, adapting itself either to the calm dictates of reason, or to the bent of a fervid imagination, or to the vehement feelings of passion and appetite, the order, which obtains in Latin, may properly be denominated the natural arrangement.

Having now presented the reader with a brief illustration of the general principles, by which the arrangement in Latin and in English is regulated, I proceed to offer a few rules for Latin collocation.

SECT. II.

On Latin Arrangement.

“ Collocationis est componere et struere verba sic, ut neve asper eorum concursus, neve hiulcus sit, sed quodammodo coag-mentatus, et lævis.” Cic. de Orat. Lib. iii.

I. In historical narration, and didactic composition of every kind, the subject is generally put before the verb—as, Deus mundum gubernat.

Exc. 1. When the subject is closely connected with the succeeding clause, and is by it either limited or explained, it follows the verb. “ In duobus tum exercitibus erant trigemini fratres, nec aetate, nec vi-ribus dispare.” Liv. i. 24. “ Erant omnino itinera duo, quibus itineribus domo exire possent.” Cæs. B. G. i.

Exc. 2. When the author wishes the attention of the reader to rest on the subject, the nominative then follows the verb, and generally concludes the sentence, or clause. This exception will be particularly illustrated hereafter.

II. Agreeably to the general principle of Latin arrangement, by which the subject precedes the predicate, the adjective ought to follow the substantive. But, with a few exceptions, and all of these not universally observed, the place of the adjective and participle is entirely arbitrary. “ Hæc victoria in luxuriam vertit.” Liv. iii. 64. “ Mortuo Tullo.” Id. i. 32. “ Devictis Sabinis.” Id. i. 31. “ Castris receptis.” Id. iii. 29. “ Hoc et in sequente anno.” Id. iv. 11. “ Tuas jam literas Brutus exspectabat.” Cic. Att. xvi. 15. “ Patrem tuum plurimum feci.” Cic. Att. xvi. 19. In the following cases, the adjective is generally put before the substantive.

1st. When the adjective is any of the following words—Primus, Medius, Ultimus, Extremus, Summus, Infimus, Imus, Supremus, Reliquis, Cæterus, denoting Prima pars, Media pars, &c. it is generally put before the substantive. “ Summus mons.” Cæs. “ Extremo libro.” Cic. Off. iii. 3.

2dly. When the substantive governs another in the genitive, the adjective generally precedes both; as “ Propria veri inquisitio.” Cic. Off. i. 4. “ Duo Platonis præcepta.” Cic. Off. i. 25. “ Vera autem animi magnitudo.” Cic.

3dly. When the substantive is governed by a preposition, the adjective is frequently put before the substantive; as, “ Hac in quæstione.” Cic. “ Magna ex parte.” Id. “ Quam ad spem.” Cæs.

4thly. For the sake of euphony,—as “ Qui adipisci veram gloriam volet," Cic. Off. ii. 13, rather than "gloriam veram volet."

5thly. The pronouns, Is, Ille, Hic, Iste, are very generally placed before the substantive, and if used substantively, are placed before the participle. This arrangement not only renders the reference more pointed, but also increases the strength, and generally improves the melody of the clause. We therefore say, "Hoc tempore." Cic. "Ea tempestate." Sall. "Hac re." Cæs. "Eo regnante." Liv.

III. The relative generally follows the antecedent, and should be placed as near to it as possible. "Ex quatuor autem locis, in quos honesti naturam vimque divisimus, primus ille, qui in veri cognitione consistit." Cic. Off. i. 6.

IV. Agreeably to the preceding rule, the relative is generally the first word of its own clause; and when it is taken for Et ille, Et hic, Et is, or for these pronouns singly, its place is uniformly the first. The reference is thus more clearly marked; and accordingly this arrangement is favourable to perspicuity and strength. "Quod ubi Cæsar resciit." Cæs. B. G. i. 28. "Qui si jussissent." Cæs. B. G. i. 26. "Qui cum eum in itinere convenissent," Cæs. B. G. i. 28, equivalent to Et cum illi eum in itinere convenissent. So also with the relative adverb, "Quo cum pervenissent." Liv.

Scheller observes, that when instead of referring to a preceding word, it refers to one following, the relative is properly put in the second or third place of its own clause; as Deum qui colit, is felix est. That the relative is often so placed, is unquestionably true; but the examples of a contrary order are so numerous, that Scheller's observation, if we are to understand it as amounting to a general rule, cannot be admitted as correct. "Qui se metui volent, a quibus metuentur, eosdem metuant ipsi necesse est." Cic. Off. ii. 7. "Qui aliter fecerit, eum contra rem publicam et salutem omnium facturum." Sall. in Or. Cæs. "Qui proprio nomine perduellis esset, is hostis vocaretur." Cic. Off. i. 12. "Quod igitur latissime patet—id amplectamur." Cic. Off. ii. 7.

V. The governing word is generally placed after its regimen, as Carthaginiensium dux—Laudis avidus—Romanorum ditissimus—Hostem fudit—Discere volo. "Tantam me inimicorum multitudinem suscepisse video." Cic. Orat. in Cat. 4. Here after the word me, which is the accusative before suscepisse, every word is under the government of that, which immediately follows it. Prepositions, as the name imports, generally precede their regimen; they are, therefore, exceptions from this rule.

VI. Adverbs are generally placed immediately before the word which they are intended to modify, as "Leviter ægrotantes, leniter curant." Cic. Off. i. 24.

VII. Conjunctions generally introduce the clause, to which they belong. "At si dares hanc vim." Cic. "Sed profecto in omni re fortuna dominatur." Sall.

Exc. 1. The enclitic conjunctions Que, Ve, Ne, are always suffixed, the two first to the latter of the two words, which they serve to couple—as “Albus aterve.” Cic. Boni malique;—and the last, to the subject, which the question chiefly regards—thus, Loquarne? “Shall I speak?” Egone loquar? “Shall I speak?”

Exc. 2. The conjunctions Autem, Enim, Vero, Quoque, Quidem, are always placed after the introductory word of the clause, generally in the second place, and sometimes in the third—as Ille autem, Ego enim, Qui vero—not Autem ille, Enim ego, Vero qui. These are, therefore, called postpositive conjunctions.—Etiam, Igitur, and Tamen, are more frequently assigned the second or third place, than the first. Of these, indeed, Igitur is uniformly, I believe, by Cicero, used as a postpositive conjunction. “Hæ disciplinæ igitur.” Cic. Off. i. 2. “Placet igitur.” Cic. Off. i. 2. “Quoniam igitur.” Ib. i. 9. Tacitus, Nepos, and Sallust have, in one or two passages, used it prepositively. Etiam also is much more frequently used as a postpositive, than as a prepositive conjunction. “Atque etiam.” Cic. “Delectant etiam.” Cic. Tamen frequently introduces a clause, though it more generally is placed in the second or third place, and sometimes even at the very end of a sentence.

VII. Words connected in sense should be as close as possible to each other: and the words of one clause should never be mixed with those of another.

When Horace says, Terrarum dominos evehit ad deos, it is impossible to ascertain, whether Terrarum dominos refer to the Romans, or to the gods. If we say, Vidistin' hominem malum qui hoc mihi dedit? punctuation only can determine whether we mean, “Did you see the wicked man, who gave me this?” or “Did you see the man, who did me this mischief?” And it is surely unnecessary to observe, that no sentence should be so constructed, that its meaning shall depend on punctuation only. If the former of the two senses be intended, we should say, Hominem malum vidistin', qui hoc mihi dedit? If the latter, Hominem vidistin' qui hoc malum mihi dedit? “Vidi ego qui juvenem seros desisset amores.” Tibull. i. 5, 47. Here the word Juvenem, which belongs to the primary and antecedent clause, is improperly thrust into the relative clause. The syntactical arrangement is Ego vidi juvenem, qui desisset seros amores.

If the words of one clause are kept distinct from those of another, they may be interchanged among themselves, as the writer may think fit. Thus, Juvenem ego vidi, qui seros amores desisset, or Ego juvenem vidi, qui seros desisset amores, or Vidi juvenem ego, qui desisset seros amores. But care must be taken that the words of one clause shall not be mixed with those of another; for this never fails to confuse and perplex the reader.

IX. Circumstances, that is, the “cause,” the “manner,” the “instrument,” the “time,” the “place,” are expressed before the predicate. “Eum ferro oceidi. Ego te ob egregiam virtutem semper amavi." Nep. "Quum Brundusium venissem." Cic.

X. An aggregate of particulars, to which any addition is to be expressed, or from which any exception is to be signified, generally precedes the addition, or the exception. "Ego, præter cæteras tuas virtutes, humanitatem tuam admiror." Cic. In the following sentence, Cicero has departed from this arrangement, in order to place the relative as near as possible to its antecedent. "Omnium civitatum totius Siciliæ legationes adsunt præter duas civitates, quarum duarum duo crimina vel maxima minuerentur." Cic.

Or. in Q. Cæc.

XI. The proper name should precede the name of the rank, or profession—as Cicero orator, An-nibal dux.

XII. The vocative, as a mark of distinction, should either introduce the sentence, or be placed among the first words. "Credo, vos, judices." Cic. "Si tibi, frater, ista contigissent." Cic.

XIII. Where there is an antithesis, the words chiefly opposed to each other, should be as close together as possible.—"Appetis pecuniam, virtutem abjicis. In provinciam profectus es pauper, dives Romam rediisti." Cic. "Excludor ego, ille recipitur." Ter. Eun. i. 2. 79.

XIV. It is a general rule, that sentences, especially in the higher départments of prose, should be so constructed, that, while in each clause and member we proceed successively from shorter to longer words, the several clauses and members shall gradually increase in length, as we advance towards the close of the sentence. “Augeri enim,” says Quintilian, “debent sententiae et insurgere.” Inst. lib. ix. cap. 4. The same rule is delivered by Diomedes. “In verbis observandum est, ne a majoribus ad minora descendat oratio; melius enim dicitur, Vir est optimus, quam, Vir optimus est.” (Diom. de Struct. perf. Orat. lib. ii.) To this rule, both as it respects the length of single words, as well as that of clauses and members, no writer was ever more attentive than Cicero. Whenever the dignity of the subject requires a certain elevation of style, this gradual swell, as we approach the close of the period, imparts dignity and strength to the sentence, and, if skilfully managed, renders its cadence flowing and harmonious. In other circumstances, however, this studied and artificial structure would be highly unsuitable. Plain and familiar subjects require a diction simple and easy. “Parvum parva decent,” (Hor.) is a maxim equally applicable to the garb of sentiment, as to the apparel of the body. Nay, even in cases, where this structure is adapted to the subject, its constant recurrence would render the style too stately and affected, while it would fatigue the ear by a monotonous uniformity*. Continued elaboration is unnatural and tiresome.

* “Virtutes enim ipsæ tedium parciunt, nisi gratia varietatis adjutæ.—Orationis compositio nisi varia est, et offendit similitudine, et affectatione deprehenditur.” Quint. Inst. lib. ix. cap. 4.
“In universum autem, si sit necesse, duram potius et asperam

XV. As a corollary to this rule, it follows, that a sentence ought not to conclude with a monosyllable. If, instead of saying, “Capitibus involutis, se in Tiberim præcipitaverant,” Liv. iv. 12, we say, In Tiberim præcipitaverant se; or instead of “Patricii soluti legum magistratumque verecundia per se quoque tribuniciam potestatem agerent,” Liv. iv. 56, we say, “Agerent per se,” we render the cadences harsh and abrupt. Nothing is more unpleasant, because nothing is less natural, than rapid transitions, or sudden breaks. We are delighted with the gradually expiring tones of the Eolian lute, or the soft cadence of the summer breeze, which die slowly on the ear, and leave behind them an agreeable impression. On the contrary, every ear is sensible of a kind of shock, when, during the progress of an interesting melody, the instrument suddenly stops. In like manner, by a round, full, and soft cadence, the ear is gratified and delighted; by an abrupt and violent termination of a sentence, it feels a sort of shock, or concussion, as if from the crash of a sudden fall, or the noise of an unexpected explosion*.

But though it be a general, it is by no means a universal rule, that a sentence shall not be concluded with a monosyllable. The following cases furnish a few exceptions.

compositionem malim esse, quam effeminatam, et enervem.”
Quint. Inst. lib. ix. cap. 4. ad finem.

* See some judicious observations on this subject, by the Rev. Richard Lyne, in his “Latin Primer.”

1st. When by ecthlipsis, the final m, with its vowel, in the word immediately preceding the monosyllable, is cut off. “In Asia continenter vixisse laudandum est.” Cic. Orat. pro Muræn.—“Hodierno die vobis judicandum est.” Cic. Orat. 4 in Cat.

2dly. When by a synalæpha the final vowel, in the word immediately preceding the monosyllable, is elided. “Atque homine libero est.” Cic. Orat. pro Rab. “Interfectum jure concedas necesse est.” Id. pro Rab. For as Quintilian observes, “Synalæpha facit, ut ultimæ syllabæ pro una sonent.” Lib. ix. cap. 4.

3dly. When the monosyllable is an auxiliary verb, as “Domi suæ condemnatus est.” Cic. Orat. pro Rab. “Internecione civium dijudicatæ sint.” Cic. Orat. in Cat. 3. And sometimes, though seldom, when the substantive verb is not auxiliary.—Both these cadences, however, as they are somewhat harsh, should be sparingly used.

4thly. When the subject sinks, or proceeds from greater to less, the words may gradually decrease in length, and the sentence end in a monosyllable.—Thus, in the following passage from Horace, an anticlimax is intended, and the structure of the verse must be regarded as a beauty.

“Parturiunt montes; nascetur ridiculus mus.”

De Art. Poët.

It has been already observed, that language, in order to answer the purpose for which it is intended, ought to be clear, and easily intelligible.—If to perspicuity be superadded, beauty, elegance, harmony, vivacity, and strength, they promote its utility as a vehicle of thought, and materially enhance its value. Still, however, it is to be remembered, that these latter qualities are of inferior importance. They are useful, but not essential. Perspicuity, on the contrary, is absolutely indispensable. If, therefore, the observance of any of the preceding rules for arrangement should, in any case, seem likely to create ambiguity, or obscurity, the rule must be sacrificed to clearness and precision. No excellence can atone for the want of perspicuity.—“Oratio vero,” says Quintilian, “cujus summa virtus est perspicuitas, quam sit vitiosa, si egeat interprete?” Inst. lib. i. cap. 7.

Euphony also frequently requires a deviation from several of these rules. Though a good ear is far the best monitor for guarding against either a harsh, or an excessively smooth diction, it may not be unuseful, if we offer a few brief admonitions on the subject of euphony. The numbers of prose, or more particularly, harmony of cadence, will become the subject of future consideration.

1st. Then, euphony forbids the concurrence of vowels, when they produce a disagreeable hiatus, or mouthing. That the structure of the Latin language is such, as to render it impossible to avoid the concurrence of vowels, is a fact too obvious to require illustration. The Latins seem, indeed, in many cases, to have preferred this concurrence, even when they might, in perfect consistence with analogy, have easily avoided it. Thus, we have Abiit, Transierit, Desiisset, for Abivit, Transiverit, Desivisset. On the other hand, we remark a desire, in some instances, to prevent the concurrence of vowels. We find, for example, d inserted after pro, in compound words, when the word, with which the preposition is compounded, begins with a vowel—thus, Prodes, Prodeo, Prodii. We find, also, comparatives from adjectives in ius rejected, as Piior.—We find likewise, A and E used before consonants, Ab and Ex before vowels.

But, though we observe these evidences of a desire to avoid the concurrence of vowels, we find a much greater number of instances, in which they paid no regard whatever to this principle. The rules, therefore, which have been delivered by ancient writers on this subject must be understood, in a qualified sense, if we wish to reconcile them, either with the structure of the language, or the practice even of the writers themselves. Quintilian says, “Tum vocalium cursus, qui cum accidit, hiat et intersistit, et quasi laborat oratio.” Inst. lib. ix. cap. 4. The vowels, of which especially he censures the concurrence, are those, which are pronounced with the roundest and widest opening of the mouth. The offence, he observes, is less, when a short vowel follows a long one; still less when a long follows a short; and least of all when both vowels are short, and pronounced with nearly the same opening of the mouth. The same general rule is given by the author of the four books of Rhetoric, addressed to Herennius, with this difference, however, that the rule is with propriety limited, the prohibition being confined to the frequent concurrence of vowel sounds. “ Ea conservabitur, si fugiemus crebras vocalium concursiones, quæ vastam atque hiantem orationem reddunt.” Auctor. ad Heren. lib. iv.

The opinion of Cicero on this subject, has been involved in some obscurity. He says, in one passage, “ Habet enim ille tanquam hiatus concursu vocalium molle quiddam, et quod indicet non ingratam negligentiam de re hominis, magis quam de verbis, laborantis.” Cic. Orat. In another place, “ Nam, ut in legendō oculus, sic animus in dicendo prospiciet, quid sequatur; nec extremorum verborum cum insequentibus primis concursus, aut hiuleas voces, efficiat, aut asperas. Quamvis enim suaves gravesque sententiæ, tamen, si incondite positis verbis efferuntur, offendent aures, quarum est judicium subtilissimum. Quod quidem Latina lingua sic observat, nemo ut tam rusticus sit, quin vocales nolit conjungere.” Ib. In the former passage, he asserts, that there is a degree of softness in the concurrence of vowels, and that, though it betrays negligence in the author, it is a negligence by no means offensive. In the latter he observes, that no man is so rustic as not to be averse to the conjunction of vowels. On this ground, Scheller charges him with inconsistency. Ernesti, indeed, reads Qui for Quin, in the latter passage, which reverses its meaning. This lection reconciles the passage with the preceding observation of Cicero, respecting the softness of concurrent vowels, and also with an observation, which immediately follows *: “Sed Graeci viderint; nobis, ne si cupiamus quidem, distrahere vocales conceditur.”

Without entering, however, into an examination, which of the two readings is the more correct, we may warrantably, it is presumed, interpret the words of Cicero in the following sense. He admits that there is a degree of smoothness in concurrent vowels. He admits also, that this concurrence is a proof of

* The reading given by this excellent critic, in which he has followed Aldus and Junta, reconciles the orator with himself, and on this ground we prefer it. Victorius, he observes, defends quin nolit, but produces examples foreign to the question, not one of them containing quin with a negative. If by this remark we are to understand, that quin is never followed by a negative, we apprehend the observation to be incorrect. “Non dubium est,” says Simo, “quin uxorem nolit filius.” Ter. And. i. 2, 1. “Non quod dubitarem, quin nihil jure esset actum.” Cic. But we believe, there is no example of quin followed by a negative, when quin is used for qui non, the subject in the antecedent, and that in the relative clause being identical, as in the passage before us, where Nemo est quin is equivalent to quisque.

May not Cicero here refer to the practice, completely antiquated in his time, of separating a final from an initial vowel by the letter d? Thus we have in Plautus, “Nec nobis præter med aliis.” Amph. i. 1, 244. “Per Jovem juro med esse.” Amph. i. 2, 279. “Abs ted accipiat.” Asin. iv. 1, 27. “Vacuum esse istac ted ætate iis decebat noxiis.” Merc. v. 4, 23. If this conjecture be admitted, the lection of Ernesti must be deemed the correct reading; and Cicero’s meaning will be, “There is no person now so barbarous, as to be unwilling to join vowels.”

negligence in the writer, though it be rather of an agreeable than offensive kind. But can he be understood to affirm, that every example of concurrent vowels is a proof of negligence? Does he mean to assert, that, in every instance, where a word ends with a vowel, the succeeding word should begin with a consonant?—If this be his meaning, he himself is chargeable with innumerable violations of his own rule. Or can he be understood as affirming, that such concurrences can be prevented? By no means. On the contrary, he tells us, that though Demosthenes, and some other Greek writers avoided the frequent concurrence of vowels as faulty, such was the structure of the Latin Language, that the Romans could not, even if they wished it, exclude concurrent vowels. We may, therefore, it is conceived, warrantably infer, that Cicero's prohibition, like that of Auctor ad Herennium, extends only to the too frequent concurrence of vowels, and that by the expression “hiuicas voces”, he means only such a coition of vowels as occasions an offensive hiatus, or gaping.

When it is delivered, therefore, as a general rule, to avoid the concurrence of vowels, the extent of the rule must be limited, not by its practicability only, for this must limit every rule, but by its expediency. For constant attention to such a rule would so fetter a writer, that beauty, elegance, vivacity, and strength, would be sacrificed to a principle, at best only partially practicable; a principle, which the ancients themselves, even when they could practise it, frequently omitted to observe.—All, therefore, which the rule, generally given on this subject, can be justly understood to imply, is this, that the too frequent concurrence of vowels should be prevented, and that we should uniformly avoid such coitions as are difficult to be pronounced distinctly, and are offensive to the ear. Of the latter, the following passage from an ancient writer will furnish an example. “ Bacæ Eoæ amœnissimæ impendebant.”

2dly. A concurrence of harsh consonants should be avoided. “ Consonantes quoque, eæque præcipue, quæ sunt asperiores, in commissura verborum rixantur, et s ultima, cum x proxima, quarum tristior etiam si binæ collidantur, stridor est, ut ars studiorum.” Quint. ix. 4. The harsher articulations are those of D, K, C, and *G, Q, R, S, T. A conformity to this rule will naturally be dictated by the ear itself, and the difficulty of pronunciation, when several harsh consonants concur. Thus, for example, it requires a strong, and almost painful effort, to pronounce Vix strepitus, Post stragem, Trans stramineum; and the harshness of the articulation seems a sufficient admonition to avoid them.

3dly. Several monosyllables in succession should be avoided. “ Etiam monosyllaba, si plura sint, male continuabuntur; quia necesse est, compositio multis clausulis concisa subsultet.” Quint. ix. 4.—One of the annotators on this passage has given the following example,—“ Do quod vis, et me victus volensque remitto.” Virg. Aen. xii. 833. Here are no fewer than five monosyllables, which produce a subsultory and unpleasant effect. The verse seems to hop or start, rather than move smoothly and gracefully along.

* We read Latin as we read English, giving C and G sometimes the hard and sometimes the soft sound. The former only was employed by the Romans.

4thly. A continuation of too long words should also be avoided. “ Afferunt enim”, says Quintilian, “ dicendi tarditateni.” They fatigue the reader, and make the sentence drag.

5thly. A continued repetition of the same letter, whether it be initial, middle, or final, should be avoided. Nothing scarcely can be conceived more offensive to the ear, than the following passage, quoted by Auctor ad Herennium, from an ancient poet, “ O Tite, tute Tati, tibi tanta tyranne tulisti.” lib. iv. The following clause from Cicero is, on this ground, somewhat objectionable, “ Privato illo judicio transacto, aut delato.” Cic. in Verr.

6thly. A repetition of the same syllable or syllables in close succession, or at short intervals, should be avoided—as Monet, et hortatur. “ Per per breve tempus. O fortunatam natam me consule Romam!” Cic. “ Pleniore ore.” Cic. Off. i. 18. “ Negligens est gens.” Liv. v. 46.

7thly. It is advisable, likewise, to prevent the same close from returning several times in the same sentence. “ Quem posteaquam inanem locum offendunt, et prætorem commovisse ex eo loco castra senserunt, statim sine ullo metu in portum ipsum penetrare cœperunt.” Cic. in Verr.

8thly. Verse ought not to be intermixed with prose. “Versum fugimus in oratione”, is the remark of Cicero. A sentence concluding like an hexameter is particularly faulty—as “Veteres fidosque clientes.” Sall. B. C. “Forsan multi vincerent, si vincere posse putarent.” In the beginning of a sentence it is less striking, and therefore more pardonable. “Facturusne operaे pretium sim.” Liv. Præf. This, indeed, is not an error against euphony; but it savours of affectation, and betrays a want of taste.

Before dismissing this part of our subject, it may be necessary, for the sake of the junior reader, to remark, that we find offences against several of these rules in the best classic writers, and that Cicero himself, as some of the examples evince, is not entirely free from them. It is necessary, also, that the reader should bear in mind, that without sacrificing strength, precision, and perspicuity, it is in many cases impossible to avoid transgressing several of these rules. To catch at the shadow, and lose the substance, is an argument of folly.

Having offered these general rules for the selection of words, and also for their arrangement, it may be useful, if we subjoin a few directions for assisting the junior scholar in the exercise of translation.

CHAPTER III.

OF TRANSLATION.

A GOOD translation has by some critics been supposed to consist in such an exhibition of the sense and spirit of the original, as the author himself would give, were he as correctly acquainted with the language, into which the work is rendered, as with that, in which it was originally composed.—This definition, it is conceived, allows the translator a greater liberty, than, in his proper character, he is permitted to assume. For, if the original were composed in a language, the scanty vocabulary of which did not furnish him with words, sufficiently expressive of his meaning, it is to be presumed, that, in exhibiting his sentiments in a more copious language, he would naturally avail himself of its superior capacity of expression, and, instead of employing words precisely equivalent to those in the original, he would select such as correctly expressed the sense he intended. In adopting, however, this procedure, it is obvious, that he blends the author with the translator; and, though the translation may be esteemed more valuable than the original, as more faithful to the author's sentiments and manner, yet it cannot be justly regarded as purely a translation. It may be a more correct exhibition of the conceptions of the author, but it cannot be deemed an accurate delineation of his sense and manner, as they appear in the original.—It may be a faithful portrait of the author; but not an accurate copy of his work.

A good translation has been defined by others to be that, which a translator would give, who is studious of fidelity, and is perfectly acquainted with the language of the original, and of that also, in which he undertakes to exhibit it.

The perfection of any work of art is to be estimated by its subserviency to the end, which it aims at attaining ; and the rules of the art itself are deducible from the purpose, which it is intended to answer. We may regard the abilities of those, who are conversant in it, as a criterion of the degree of perfection, at which it may have arrived ; and we may state, that certain qualifications are necessary to success ; but when we speak of “abilities”, and “qualifications”, we have evidently in view the ultimate object, which it is the professed purpose of the art to attain. I prefer, therefore, the following definition given by a critic of great taste and discernment, as more directly referring to the great end, which all translation is intended to answer*. “A good translation”, says he, “I would describe to be That in which the merit of the original work is so completely transfused into another language, as to be as distinctly apprehended, and as strongly felt, by a native of the country, to which that language belongs, as it is by those, who speak the language of the original work.”

This description of a good translation is substantially correct, though it involves, I apprehend, a verbal inaccuracy. It is not surely the merit of the work, which should be completely transfused into another language, or which should be equally apprehended by the speakers of both languages ; but the sentiments, the spirit, the manner of the author. The great aim of the translator is, not to enable his reader to appreciate the merit of the original, but to exhibit its sense, its spirit, its whole character with fidelity. The author continues—

* See an “Essay on the Principles of Translation”, by Mr. Tytler, second edition.

“Now, supposing this description to be a just one, which I think it is, let us examine, what are the laws of translation, which may be deduced from it.” It will follow,

1st. “That the translation should give a complete transcript of the ideas of the original work.”

2dly. “That the style and manner of writing should be of the same character, with that of the original.”

3dly. “That the translation should have all the ease of original composition.”

This is a concise, as well as a conspicuous and correct statement of what constitutes the excellence of any translation. According to this description, the character of a good translation consists in strict fidelity. Not an idea more or less, whether primary, or secondary, is to be expressed in the translation, than the original contains. A “complete transfusion”, of the “ideas” excludes whatever is more or less than complete; and an equally distinct apprehension of these by natives of the two countries, in which the languages are severally spoken, implies a faithful and perfect exhibition of the original. When the learned critic, therefore, admits (as he does afterwards) the superaddition of accessory ideas, if they have a necessary connection with the original thought, and increase its force ; and when he allows the retrenchment of an accessory idea, if it does not weaken or impair the thought *, he admits a licence, which is apprehended to be incompatible with his own description. A transcript implies a copy ; a complete transcript implies a perfect copy : but that copy cannot be perfect or correct, in which there is either more or less than the subject to be transcribed.

If there were two languages, which perfectly harmonized one with the other in general structure, and individual idiom, having the same capacity of expression, and mutually correspondent vocabularies of respectively equivalent terms, in short, constituting perfect counterparts to each other, then, it will not be disputed, that a perfect translation might be made from one language into the other. And, if such a translation were executed, why should we distinguish it by the epithet “ perfect ”, but because it delineates with strict and perfect fidelity, not merely the general image, but every feature and lineament of the author—the precise sense, spirit, and manner of his work, with all the natural freedom, and fluency, of an original composition. If this, then, be unquestionably a perfect translation, is not every deviation from this a

* It is difficult, indeed, to conceive how an accessory idea can be excluded without impairing the thought. The very supposition appears to involve a contradiction. What is less than the whole thought cannot possibly be the whole. To suppose that any deduction can be made, without impairing the integrity of the subject, involves an absurdity.

character of imperfection? And is not the introduction, or suppression, of an accessory idea, which either increases or diminishes the force of the original, a deviation from the original? Is not the imperfection of the translation more or less great, in proportion as it departs from the exemplar before it, whether this departure arise from the intractability and inadequacy of the language, or from the incompetency of the translator himself?

I am well aware, that there are not any two languages, which so harmoniously accord, as to render so faithful a translation practicable; but let it be observed, that it is one thing to be compelled by the inadequacy of the language, to adopt a term of more or less strength, of greater or less beauty, or a term implying more or less than the original—I say, it is one thing to be compelled to adopt this by the necessity of the case, and quite another thing to exercise a licence to that effect, where the language furnishes apposite, and precisely equivalent expressions. Nay, the learned critic does not confine this licence to the admission, or the exclusion of secondary ideas only; he even admits, in certain cases, the insertion of clauses. This, I conceive, is directly repugnant to his own principles; nor can I imagine any thing, which has a greater tendency to shake the reader's confidence, in the fidelity of all translation, than the suspicion, that he does not see the author precisely as he is, or, at least, as correctly as the medium can possibly exhibit him. The translator may, indeed, improve the original ; but it is the author, and the author only, that the reader desires to see, and not the translator.

A greater latitude must, doubtless, be allowed to the poetical, than to the prose translator. The former has not only, in common with the latter, to contend with the mutual repugnancy of the two languages, but is likewise fettered by the laws of versification ; the other has to encounter only the reciprocal incongruity of the language of the original, and that of the translation. As far, therefore, as this repugnance will permit, it is his duty to adhere to the strict sense, and spirit, and manner, of the author. All sentiments, all primary conceptions, how natural soever, should be excluded, nor should a secondary idea be admitted, if the capacity of the language will enable the translator to reject it*.

* Since the preceding observations were written, the author has perused a treatise by M. Huet, the learned bishop of Avranches, De optimo genere interpretandi, and is gratified to find, that the doctrine, which that ingenious and able writer there endeavours to establish, is, in almost every point, coincident with that, which is here proposed for the direction of the reader.

After defining translation, he says, “ Optimum illum esse interpretandi modum, quum auctoris sententiae primùm, deinde ipsis etiam, si ita fert utriusque linguae facultas, verbis arctissime adhæret interpres, et nativum postremo auctoris characterem, quoad ejus fieri potest, adumbrat ; idque unum studet, ut nulla eum detractioe imminutum, nullo additamento auctum, sed integrum, suique omni ex parte simillimum perquam fideliter exhibeat.—Cum enim nihil aliud esse videatur interpretatio, quam

CHAPTER IV.

TRANSLATION DIFFICULT, AND SOMETIMES IMPRACTICABLE.

To be qualified for translating with precision and fidelity, humble as the office, and easy as the task may to some persons appear, requires a more than ordinary share of correct taste, sound judgment, and philosophical acumen.

The two following requisites, among the numerous qualifications of a good translator, are indispensably necessary. 1st. A critical acquaintance with the words, the structure, and the genius, of the original : and 2dly. A perfect knowledge of the language in which the translator undertakes to exhibit his author*.

expressa auctoris imago, et effigies, ea autem optima imago habenda sit, quæ lineamenta oris, colorem, oculos, totum denique vultûs filum, et corporis habitum ita refert, ut absens coram adesse videatur ; inepta vero ea figura sit, quæ rem aliter effingit, atque est, pulchriorem illam licet, et aspectu jucundiores exprimat : id profecto efficitur, eam demum præstabiliorum esse interpretationem, non quæ auctoris luxuriem depascat, vel jejunitatem expleat, vel obscuritatem illustret, vel menda corrigat, vel perversum ordinem digerat, sed quæ totum auctorem ob oculos sistat, nativis adumbratum coloribus, et vel suis virtutibus laudandum, vel, si ita meritus sit, propriis deridendum vitiis propinet." Lib. i.

* Though the two qualifications here mentioned may be regarded as the most indispensable, they are far from constituting

The latter of these, though it may to some persons appear to be of easy attainment, requires no mean powers of intellect, no ordinary penetration, and no common share of attention and industry. If it be true, as it demonstrably is, that there are not to be found, in any language, two words precisely equivalent, it may naturally be inferred by those, at least, who are conversant in philological inquiries, that to determine with precision the nice, and, in some cases, almost evanescent distinctions, subsisting between words apparently synonymous, is a task, which demands the most rigid attention, and most laborious research, combined with no vulgar share of intuitive sagacity, and logical discrimination.

In the common interchange of sentiment, it is generally a matter of indifference, whether of two synonymes, this or that be employed. The purposes of speech are sufficiently answered, without an observance of those nice distinctions, which belong to the province of the critic and philologist. The human mind, in all subjects familiar to its contemplation, is perspicacious enough, to discern the sentiment of the speaker, though loosely, and even ambiguously expressed. But in scientific disquisition, the utmost a good translator. A discriminating and sound intellect, a correct taste, a knowledge of the usages, laws, religion, and polity of the people, by whom the language was spoken, an acquaintance with the subject of which the author treats, to which may be added, a mind congenial to his, are all, though in different degrees, necessary to form a good translator.

precision is indispensably requisite. Besides, it is to be remembered, that it is required of the translator, not loosely and vaguely to exhibit the sentiments of his author, so that the reader shall apprehend merely the leading ideas, or form an imperfect conception of the meaning; but, like a faithful mirror, to reflect every image with clearness and with truth, precisely as the author himself has presented it. We require of him not a general resemblance, but a correct portrait of his original, as far as his materials are capable of furnishing it.

The second requisite is a critical acquaintance with the language of the original. And here I would not be understood to allude to that knowledge, which consists in a correct acquaintance with its grammatical principles, though this unquestionably is indispensable, but to that critical knowledge of the precise import of the words individually, whose meaning he undertakes to exhibit in his translation. Devoid of this essential qualification, he may, indeed, sketch a rude likeness of his author, but must be utterly incapable of portraying, with effect, those finer lineaments, and nicer characters, which are indispensable to a correct and precise delineation of the original. And, if to ascertain the distinction between synonymous words, and to apprehend the precise import of the terms, which we are daily in the practice of speaking, reading, or hearing, requires a more than ordinary share of philological sagacity; it surely needs no argument to prove, that the difficulty of the task must be incomparably greater, when the words of a foreign and dead language form the subjects of investigation.—Yet the classical translator, in order to be qualified for his office, must be critically acquainted with the precise import of every word in his original, while he is perfectly master of that language, in which he undertakes to exhibit the author to his reader. These qualifications, evidently require extensive reading, rigid attention, penetrating genius, and laborious research *.

* Though a correct and critical acquaintance with the language of the original, and with that also, into which it is to be rendered, may be justly deemed the principal qualification in a translator, it is far from constituting the sole requisite. There are, besides this, various other qualifications, which, though of subordinate importance, are, notwithstanding, indispensably necessary to a clear and perfect delineation of the author. The consideration of these, however, belongs rather to the province of the rhetorician, than the philologist. But it is not to be imagined, that, because precision is the chief excellence, if the translator attain this object, he has, therefore, arrived at the perfection of his art. It is incumbent on him not only to exhibit the precise conceptions of his author, but to present them also in the same light, assigning to each its just importance. In a historical painting, the figures severally may be correct resemblances of the objects they represent; but one may be too prominent, another too retired; one may have too much, another too little shade. In like manner, in translation, an idea, to which the author has assigned a pre-eminent rank, may be thrown by the translator into a subordinate and obscure place; and, on the contrary, a sentiment, comparatively unimportant, and incidentally suggested, may, in the hands of the translator, assume a consequence, which it possesses not in the original, and with which the author

But with these attainments, there remains still another difficulty, which the translator has to encounter, a difficulty, the more formidable, as no labour, no ingenuity, on his part, is, in all cases, capable of removing it. For with the most correct and extensive acquaintance with both languages, it frequently occurs, that the translator cannot possibly find words himself never intended to invest it. This is a common error; and though it offends not against the rules of mere precision, it materially affects the character of that impression, which the sentiment in the original is calculated to produce. The truth of this observation, it would be easy to illustrate by a variety of examples, did our limits permit. I shall only remark, that in no case, perhaps, is the young translator more prone to err in this respect, than by turning the verb into a participle, and an independent into a relative clause. He is informed, as is the fact, that conciseness and elegance are frequently consulted by this mode of constructing a sentence; and hence, without a discriminating judgment to direct his practice, while he aspires to excellence, he is sometimes seduced into the commission of error.

It is necessary also, that the translator, as far as the language will admit, should transfuse into his version the spirit of his author. It is a mistake to imagine, that this may be effected by precision in translating. Two versions may be, in every respect, substantially the same; in neither may a single conception be either omitted or superadded; and yet the one shall be consentaneous, and the other repugnant, to the spirit of the original. The manner also of the author must be correctly copied, by whatever character it may be distinguished, whether it be grave or gay, uniform or varied, easy or formal. In short, to constitute the translator, there must be combined with a correct acquaintance with the two languages, an intuitive and correct perception of beauty, dignity, and sublimity; a delicate and well-cultivated taste, joined to a sound and discriminating judgement.

to express, with strict precision, the sentiments of his original.—Hence translation is, in some instances, not merely difficult, but absolutely impracticable. To those who have devoted any considerable portion of time and attention to philological researches, and have been critically conversant in the practice of translation, this assertion will not require either example to illustrate, or argument to evince its truth. For the sake, however, of the junior reader, it may be useful, if we endeavour to explain the causes which render translation in some instances imperfect, and in others impracticable.

In every language there are certain complex terms, to which two ideas are annexed, a primary, and a secondary. Two words therefore may concur, in expressing the same primary conception, while the secondary ideas suggested by them are materially different. Taberna and Officina agree in denoting a shop, or a place where manufactured goods are to be found ; but the latter signifies the place where they are made, the former, that where they are made or sold. Falsehood and Lie agree in expressing the same primary idea, namely, a deviation from truth ; but they differ in this ; the former denotes a violation of physical, the latter of moral truth. The former, therefore, does not necessarily imply an intention to deceive ; the latter denotes a wilful breach of veracity, and is a term of reproach. Clergyman and Parson denote each a minister of religion : but the secondary ideas are materially different, the former appellation being respectful, the latter rather contemptuous. If we say “Cæsar was killed in the Senate-house,” we signify merely, that some violence or other deprived him of life. It may have been the stroke of an enemy, or even the blow of a friend; it may have been designed, or unintentional; or his death may have been occasioned by some physical accident. The term “killed” is generical. If we say “He was butchered,” we express the same primary idea, but along with it, we denote also, that his death was effected by human agency. We signify, likewise, that the act was perpetrated with some degree of cruelty, and that the body was disfigured with wounds. If we say “He was murdered,” we express the deprivation of life by violent means, and by human hands; we signify also the criminality of the action.

These examples will suffice to shew, that two or more words may agree, in expressing the same primary idea, while the secondary ideas annexed to them are materially different. They will also serve to exemplify the importance of the accessory idea, as constituting in some cases an essential part of the sentiment intended.

Now, it is the duty of a translator to express neither more nor less, than the strict sense of the original. He is bound to present his reader with a clear and correct transcript of his author. His translation should be a faithful copy not only of his sentiments, but even of his manner. If either expressly, or by implication, he convey to his reader more or less than the sense of the original, he is chargeable, if not with incompetency, or negligence, with what is much less pardonable, deliberate infidelity.

I am aware, indeed, that, where there is neither ignorance, nor negligence, nor studied misstatement imputable to the translator, prejudices in favour of certain theories and doctrines seduce him, unconsciously, into a misrepresentation of his author. These are universally hostile to accuracy and truth; nor can their intrusion be too scrupulously watched, or too rigorously opposed. How many errors, ascribable to this cause, have disgraced the page of the translator? And such is the imperceptible influence of preconceived opinions, that, while we flatter ourselves that we are superior to prejudice, we at that moment betray our subjection to its dominion. In evidence of this truth, how often do we find two translators, of unimpeachable fidelity, assigning to the same passage two different interpretations. Nay, in historical translation, when mere facts are involved, while the author relates the simple transaction, the translator expresses also his opinion of its character. Carolus primus, Angliæ rex, necatus est, would be differently rendered according to the political sentiments of the translator. It is by employing terms expressive of their own opinions, that historians become parties in those very transactions, which they profess to delineate with candour and impartiality; and that translators in like manner pervert the sense of their authors, attributing to them such sentiments, as accord with their own favourite opinions and theories. But to return to the subject more immediately before us.

It has been observed, that in all languages, are to be found certain complex terms, to which are annexed two ideas, a primary and a secondary; and it has been shewn, that the latter of these sometimes materially affects the complexion of the sentiment. A secondary idea, therefore, can neither be omitted, nor altered, nor superadded without mutilating, or distorting, or violating, in some shape or other, the sense of the original*. Now, if there subsisted a precise and perfect coincidence between the correspondent terms of the two languages, in which the

* But though it may be truly affirmed, that no idea can be superadded, or cancelled, without impairing the correctness of the translation, it must at the same time be admitted, that there are not any two languages, which so harmoniously accord, that in all cases, terms precisely equivalent shall be found in each. To express, therefore, the full meaning of the original word, might frequently require an enunciation so tedious, tiresome, and languid, that the translator, studious to preserve the spirit of his work, is often compelled to drop the accessory idea. It is, on the other hand, equally evident, that the word in the original may be so general, that the translator must either recur to a qualification of the term, an expedient confessedly awkward, and offensive, or express somewhat more than the author intended. This, however, is the fault of the materials; and not of the artist. In such cases, approximation to the meaning of the original, as far as the capacity of the language, with a due regard to simplicity and spirit, will permit, is all that is attainable. Let it be remembered, however, that these involuntary deviations from the established principles of his art furnish no argument whatever against the principles themselves.

translator is conversant, the task of translation from the one into the other, would be comparatively easy. But such perfect equivalence does not exist ; nor, if we investigate the principles on which the association of the secondary idea depends, can it be expected to exist. Minutely to explain these principles, and to illustrate them individually by examples, would occupy more space than our limits will permit.—We must, therefore, confine ourselves to a few general observations.

The “ primitive idea ”, annexed to any word, is the idea, which originally belonged to it, and it is opposed to that, which is derived or acquired. The “ primary idea ” is that, which the word chiefly implies, and is opposed to “ secondary.” The primary conception, though frequently, is not universally, the same with the primitive import of the word, the latter sometimes gradually sinking into a mere secondary conception, and sometimes being entirely repudiated. This dissolution of the original connection between the sign and the thing signified takes place, most frequently in those cases, in which the word has acquired a figurative meaning. The primitive import of the words Nuptus, Animus, Hostis, and of Curb, Belong, Edify, is now entirely supplanted by the figurative acceptation. In general, however, we find the primitive meaning, if it does not continue to constitute the principal import of the term, entering as a component part of the complex idea which it denotes. Thus, in the words Moliri, Crinis, Cernere, and Prevent, Far- thing, Cheap, Epistle, the primitive meaning of each, though not the primary idea, implied by it, still constitutes part of its signification.

The secondary idea depends on a variety of circumstances. It is sometimes associated, because the term, in its etymological signification, implies it. Thus, asinus, denotes “an ass”; onager (ex ovos et αγορ) “a wild ass”; balneum, “a bath of any kind”; thermæ (ἀ θερμαῖ) “warm baths”; anteire, “To go before, at any distance”; præire (ex præ (πρᾶπαι) et ire,) “To go immediately before”, implying propinquity; exercitus, “an army”; or “men trained for warfare”, exerciti; agmen from agere, αγεῖν, “a body of men on march”, or “in motion.” Sometimes its association is determined by the moral and physical circumstances, in which the people are placed. An object, which in one country may be regarded with respect, may in another be viewed with contempt; what is here agreeable, may be there offensive—what awakens in one people the emotion of love, may in another excite the sentiment of hatred.—And whatever emotion or feeling the object creates, with the same emotion is its name very generally associated. In one language, also, we find a subject named from its form, in another from its matter; in one from its place, in another from its office; in one from its colour, in another from its use; in one from its chief property, or quality, in another from an accidental circumstance belonging to it. All these diversities, more or less, affect the secondary ideas attached to words in different languages, though they express one and the same subject, and denote one and the same primary conception.

It is to be observed also, that the secondary idea is, like the primary, liable to change. Of this it would be easy to produce a variety of examples. The words Parson, Dame, Lawyer, once terms of respect, have, the two first especially, been degraded to the implication of something contemptible. Sometimes a fastidious delicacy, for the origin of which it is not always easy to account, rejects a term once reputable, annexing to it an idea of vulgarity, or indecency, not originally belonging to it, nor attached to the correspondent term in any other language. Were a modern fastidious translator to render the curse pronounced on the serpent, In ventrem ambulabis, it would not be surprising if he cautiously avoided saying, “ You shall walk on your belly.”

The secondary idea is not only liable to change, but in many cases, especially where the etymon, to which it was attached, has become obsolete, or where the affinity between the root and the derivative ceases to be known, is entirely dismissed. The word Clock, for example, no longer suggests the idea of clicking, though from this accident belonging to it, this piece of mechanism derived its name.

It is an opinion, delivered by Mr. Tooke, that “ a regard to the individual etymology of a word will conduct us to its intrinsic meaning, and the cause of its application." We cannot suppose, that by "intrinsic meaning," the author intended to signify the primitive, or etymological signification; for his proposition would thus be purely identical, as far at least as that signification is concerned. If by intrinsic meaning, be understood the real, inherent, and inseparable meaning, we apprehend, that his doctrine is founded in error. That the primitive sense of every word is to be learned by investigating its etymological import, is a self-evident truth; but the primitive sense, and its present acceptation, may be so different, as not to bear to each other the most remote resemblance; and a knowledge of merely the etymological meaning, may be incapable of conducting us to the cause of its real and current signification. Koμικος and paganus may be considered as originally synonymous; yet no ideas can be more different than those suggested by comic and pagan. Nor should we have been able either to deduce the meaning of the word pagan from that of its etymon, or to explain the cause of its signification, had we not been informed, that when Christianity became the established religion of the Roman empire, the Christians preferred living in cities and towns, while unbelievers inhabited the country, or provincial villages. Who by consulting etymology or analogy would imagine, that the verbs to tie and to loose have contrary meanings, and that to untie and unloose, have the same significations? Nor would Kadash, in Hebrew (sanctifieavit) ever lead us to conclude, that kedeshah signified “a harlot.” *

Instead therefore of saying, that a regard to etymology will conduct us to the intrinsic meaning of any word, and the cause of its application, it would be more correct to say, that the circumstances of the subject, at the time of the application, explain the cause, why the term, in its primitive import, was applied to it; but that without an acquaintance with these circumstances, the cause of the application may be conjectured, but not perfectly ascertained. The doctrine of Mr. Tooke can be admitted to be true in those cases only, in which a connection necessarily or universally exists between the primitive meaning of the word, and the distinguishing or prominent character of the subject, to which it is applied. But, where this connection is not necessary or universal, but casual, temporary, or local, the cause of the application is not to be learned from the mere etymological import. Paganus means a villager. Does a knowledge simply of this fact explain the cause, why the word Pagan means a heathen? I apprehend not; unless it could be shown that there exists a necessary connection between heathenism, and a rural or provincial life.

But, if etymology were an infallible guide not only to the primitive, but also to the derivative and now perhaps primary meaning of any term, still it could determine nothing concerning the accessory idea or ideas, which usage may have associated with that term. As the habits of a people are changed, and as their sentiments, moral, political, and religious, vary, the ideas, conjoined with many words, must undergo a correspondent alteration. And as almost all the words in every language are complex in their signification, or, in the language of logicians, express complex ideas, it is not surprising if we find few, if any, of these words, denoting precisely the same assemblage of conceptions. Of these combinations one may express more, and another fewer ideas, while each denotes the same principal notion. The things signified may agree in use, and differ in form, and conversely ; as pillar and column, chamber and room. They may agree in denoting the same act ; but the one may imply indifference, and the other criminality, as to kill, and to murder. The one may signify the emotion simply, and the other the expression also of that emotion, as joy, gladness. They may agree in denoting the same act, as arising from the same impulse, and yet differ in expressing its degree, as detraction, defamation. They may agree in signifying the same profession, but with different powers, as Deacon, Priest. They may agree in expressing the same temper, but the one may signify it to be natural, and the other artificial, as gentle, tame ; the one as temporary, the other habitual, as angry, passionate. In short, when we consider the infinite modifications of which human thought is susceptible, and how variously ideas are combined or grouped under different names, though perhaps in each combination the leading notions are the same ; when we consider also the changes to which all living languages are liable, we need not be surprised that there should be few, if any, synonymous words in any language ; and that the primitive and primary, as well as the acquired and accessory ideas, annexed to words, are liable to alteration.

* See Campbell's Preliminary Dissertations, p. 116.

These general observations may suffice to shew, that the secondary ideas attached to complex terms, expressive of the same primary sense, originate from a variety of different causes, and that the associations must be as various, as arbitrary usage, with the physical and moral circumstances of the people, may necessarily render them. Hence nothing is more common, than to find two correspondent terms in two different languages, agreeing in their primary, and differing in their secondary ideas ; or one perhaps denoting the principal idea only, the other annexing to it a subordinate conception. Hence arises the difficulty of the translator ; hence also the imperfection of all translation. For, if the language, which the translator employs, fails to furnish him with words precisely equivalent to those in the original, he is compelled either to content himself with general terms, and to exhibit merely the leading ideas of the original, or to express more than his author intended. Thus his translation is necessarily defective, presenting only the prominent features of his author ; or if he employ a special for a general term, his translation is censurable, not merely as imperfect, but as erroneous and false.—The Latins, for example, had Pœna and Supplicium, the former to denote any kind of punishment, whether mild or severe, whether public or private ; the latter to express punishment inflicted by law, and therefore implying a degree of severity. We have only the generic term Punishment to denote both. In translating, therefore, the special term Supplicium by Punishment, we omit the expression of the secondary idea. If we render “Ostentat cicatrices suas,” Ter. Eun. iii. 2, 29, by the generic term “Shews,” we suppress a prominent feature in the character of Thraso, an ostentatious display being implied in the original. On the other hand we find, that there are numberless words in English, which are incapable of a precise Latin translation. If we attempt, for example, to render into Latin the English words, Cower, Squat, Queer, Lumber, Boggy, Signal, and many others, which might be specified, we shall find words significant of the primary idea, but none which express the secondary also. Every Englishman understands the difference between “He made a sign,” and “He made a signal,” but the Latins have only one expression to denote both, “Signum dedit.” Servitus, and “Servitude,” agree in denoting a state of subjection to the will of a master ; but the former denotes a slavish and involuntary subjection, the latter, what may be termed a “willing bondage.” The complex idea implied by Servitude, the Latins had no term to express.

Before we quit this part of the subject, it may be observed, as it has been already hinted, that there are certain words in every language, to which are attached ideas of vulgarity, indelicacy, obscenity, meanness, and contempt, while the correspondent terms in another language, are associated with no similar conception *. Hence, if we translate any term of the former character, by the correspondent term of the latter, we strip the expression of its secondary idea; and in cases, where the author intended to be satirical, or to excite disgust in the mind of his reader, we defeat the purpose, for which the term is employed. If, on the other hand, we translate one of the latter by the correspondent word of the former character, we degrade the expression, and do injustice to the author, by conveying an offensive idea, which he did not intend to express. Should we render, as I have heard it rendered, “Patrem absentem extimesco,” Ter. “I fear my absent dad,” we should express a sentiment of contempt not warranted by the original: on the other hand, the English word is incapable of being correctly translated into Latin, the term Pater being a respectful appellation. Were we to attempt to render the line of Spenser,

“And the rude wench her answer’d nought at all,”

we should find no term in Latin expressive of the subject, with the idea of contempt denoted by the English appellation. In vain also, should we search for terms precisely equivalent to the words Prog, Pat, Pellmell, Flam, Pother, Brainpan, and many others of a similar cast, admissible in burlesque and low comedy, the Latin words Cibaria, Aptus, Confertim, Fraus, or Fabulæ, Turba, Cranium, having nothing of that vulgarity, which belongs to the English terms.

* “Sed cum idem frequentissime plura significant, quod συρρυπα vocatur, jam sunt aliis alia honestiora, sublimiora, nitidiora, jucundiora.” Quint. Inst. lib. viii. cap. 3.

Having now briefly endeavoured to explain the causes, which render it impossible, in many cases, for the translator to express the precise meaning of the author, I proceed next to consider whence it is, that translation is, in some instances, not merely imperfect, but impracticable.

The language of every people is necessarily adapted to their wants and conveniences. Keeping pace with their moral and intellectual improvement, it is more or less copious, as their stock of ideas is more or less enlarged.—Whatever idea they have occasion to communicate, they must have a name to express it; whatever has not been perceived or imagined, cannot become an object of thought, or require a sign to denote it. The visible objects around us, of which we have occasion to speak, are some natural, others artificial, some common to every nation, others peculiar to one, or a few.

The great productions of nature are open to the observation of all men; and in every language, therefore, there are names to express them. And though different nations may entertain different conceptions of their qualities and properties, their various names may be justly regarded as precisely synonymous.— Thus 'Hλιος, Sol, "Sun," are equivalent words. So also, Ποταμος, Fluvius, and "River." — Δενδρον, Arbor, and "Tree." The names of the most obvious productions of nature have probably been coeval with the very infancy of speech; and they are correctly translateable from one language into any other.

There are some productions of nature, not common to every country; but peculiar to one, or a few places. The people, among whom they exist, have names to denote them; but among other nations by whom their existence is not known, no correspondent appellations can obtain. Their names, therefore, are not always translateable. When a knowledge of any one of these is first introduced into any nation, it is usual for the people to adopt the same name, as has been assigned to it by those, among whom it exists, or through whose medium its existence has been first communicated; thus, Ελεφας, Elephas, "Elephant." The term, in process of time, becomes naturalized, and is justly considered as precisely equivalent to the original name.

Works of art, and mechanical productions, are various in different countries. The Greeks had their Clepsydræ; the Romans their Balistæ, and Catapultæ. We have nothing which resembles these; their names, therefore, are not translateable into our language; nor, as we have rarely occasion to mention them, have the original terms been naturalized. On the other hand, the clocks, watches, and artillery, of modern times were entirely unknown to the ancient nations ; and there are, therefore, no names equivalent to these in any of the languages of antiquity.—Those artificial productions, which are common to two countries, have names in the language of each, which are either precisely, or nearly equivalent, as, Domus, Navis, Plaustrum, Mensa, “House,” “Ship,” “Waggon,” “Table.” Though the correspondent Latin and English terms do not express precisely the same combination of ideas ; yet the difference is so immaterial, while the respective purposes of the things themselves are strictly identical, that the terms may with propriety, be regarded as respectively equivalent.

But in all languages there are not only complex terms, to denote those combinations of ideas, which are copies of real existences, but there are also complex names, to express complex ideas, purely of the mind’s own combination. These associations are determined by the conveniences, the necessities, the modes of thinking and acting, or briefly, by the moral and intellectual habits of the people. Hence it seldom happens, that these names, some of which belong to what have been termed simple modes, and others to mixed modes, can be correctly translated from one language into another. Nay, the celebrated Mr. Locke affirms, that not one in ten of the names of mixed modes can be truly rendered into a foreign language. To the names of these modes belong the names of offices, ranks, laws, crimes, weights, coins and measures, usages and forms of government, civil and religious. The names of these denote certain assemblages of ideas, which a people have occasion to conceive, and to express. The simple ideas have no natural connection among themselves. The mind, for the purpose of convenience, combines them ; and the name, as Mr. Locke observes, gives them an artificial connection, and knits them together. The idea of Father, for example, and that of Murder have no natural connection. The Romans, however, combined them, and formed the word Parricidium, to express that combination. We have adopted the same combination, and transferred into our language the original name. There subsists no natural connection among the several ideas of consuls, conquered kings, arches, music, soldiers, chariots, captives, and solemn marching ; yet the Romans combined these ideas, and several others equally unconnected, into one complex idea, knitting them together by the word Triumphus, significant of the whole. We have also adopted the term, and have the combination in idea, though not the spectacle in reality. On the other hand, many combinations exist among us, to which they were entire strangers ; such are those, implied by the terms, Burglary, Sacrament, Sanctification, Absolution.

In some cases, the combination is entirely peculiar to one people, nothing among any other, in the least degree resembling it. In such instances, the name is incapable of translation, and a barbarism must necessarily be adopted, unless a short periphrasis can be found to express it. When a resemblance, approaching to identity, subsists between two complex ideas, as obtaining in two different nations, the names, though not precisely equivalent, may be rendered by each other : the translation, however, cannot be regarded as perfectly correct. Where there is a less degree of resemblance, it becomes frequently a question of considerable difficulty, whether the name should be translated, or transferred. These observations it may be necessary to illustrate by a few examples.

It has been remarked, that the names of arbitrary combinations of simple ideas, and the names of mixed modes, are not translateable, unless they happen to be common to the two nations, whose languages are in question.—In vain should we search for English words equivalent to Terminalia, Nonæ, Idus, Consul, Tribunus, Talentum, Denarius, Triumphus. We have no festivals, no divisions of time, no offices, no coins, no processions, which bear the least resemblance to these ; and, therefore, there are no single words, proper to our language, expressive of the same meaning with the words here adduced. In such cases, one or other of these alternatives is presented to our choice, either to transfer into our language the Latin terms as they stand in the original, assigning them, perhaps, an English termination, or to admit a periphrasis descriptive of the things themselves. The former of these expedients is very generally, and, indeed, very properly adopted. Accordingly we have admitted into our language the words Consul, Tribune, Nones, Ides, Talent, Denarius, Triumph.

In like manner we should inquire in vain, for single words in Latin expressive of many usages, arts, coins, measures, and institutions, which obtain in this country, as “Easter,” “Michaelmas,” “Clergyman,” “Chancellor,” “Monday,” “Shilling,” “Guinea.” The things denoted by these names had no existence among the Romans, and they had therefore no words to express them. In such cases we have the choice of latinizing the English word, or adopting a periphrasis descriptive of the thing signified.

In cases, as it has been already observed, where there subsists a pretty close resemblance between any office, observance, usage, or institution, in one country and that of another, the names in the two languages may not improperly be mutually translated. The only difficulty is to determine with precision, what degree of resemblance is necessary, to justify the translator, in designating the one, by the name of the other. Thus, though the following offices and institutions do not precisely correspond, yet there subsists perhaps a sufficient degree of resemblance, to justify us in rendering “Treasurer” by Quæstor; “A member of Parliament” by Senator, “Parliament” itself by Senatus, “A Beadle” or “Sergeant” by Lictor, or Apparitor. By this procedure we avoid the introduction of barbarisms ; but this evil is perhaps more than balanced, by the risk of seducing our reader into a conclusion, that the subjects are precisely identical, because the names are employed as mutually equivalent. Hence many translators, preferring barbarism and obscurity to pure Latin diction, when it is likely to produce a misconception of the subject, have not scrupled to latinize the English names, giving, for example, Parliamentum for “ Parliament,” Bedellus for a “ Beadle,” Baronetus for a “ Baronet,” Acra for an “ Acre.” Neither of these modes is wholly unobjectionable, and it is sometimes difficult to decide, which should be preferred, it being impossible to establish any correct and precise rule, for determining that degree of likeness or disparity, which shall justify either a translation, or a retention of the original word. In respect to names of offices, a very learned and ingenuous critic * recommends, that, when “ the resemblances preponderate,” the name should be translated; but, when “ the peculiarities preponderate,” the original name should be retained. This rule must be acknowledged to be precise; but, as the learned author himself confesses, it is not at all times easy to be applied, it being impossible in many cases to decide, whether the resemblances, or the peculiarities, be the more numerous, or the more important. Besides, I must acknowledge, it appears to me somewhat doubtful, whether a bare preponderance of similarity should justify translation; for in many instances, the peculiarities, though in weight somewhat inferior to the resemblances, may notwithstanding be of such magnitude, that a translation of the name might lead the reader into considerable error. In such instances, it appears to me much better to retain the original name. At the same time, I am perfectly aware, that this practice is liable to one great objection, namely, that to a person, unacquainted with the observances and institutions of that people, to whose language the original term belongs, the barbarism is wholly unintelligible. But is it not better, that the reader should remain ignorant of the signification of the word, or should be obliged to inquire into its meaning, than that he should be led into a misconception of the subject, while he flatters himself he correctly apprehends its nature? An inquisitive reader will naturally seek for information; and if there be others, who will not take the trouble to inquire, still it must be acknowledged, that ignorance is always preferable to error.

* Campbell’s Preliminary Dissertations.

I am also aware, that barbarisms, especially those of that class, to which the present question refers, vitiate the purity of a language, and give a translation a motley and semibarbarous appearance. Even, when assimilated by termination to the language, into which we are translating, they have still, it must be owned, somewhat of an unseemly and exotic aspect. Familiarity, however, serves to reconcile us to them; and there are numberless words in our language transferred from the Greek and Latin, which have long ceased to be regarded as barbarisms. In many cases, indeed, there can be no question, because the translator has no alternative, but to retain the original term. What office, for example, amongst us, bears even the most remote analogy to the Augur, the Pullarius, the Dictator amongst the Romans? In such cases, translation by an equivalent term is absolutely impracticable. And even in those instances, as it has been already observed, in which we find some office, usage, or institution, which bears a resemblance to that, which is denoted by the Latin word, if we employ the terms as equivalent, we incur the risk of leading the reader into a misconception of the subject. Were we, for example, to render Tribunus Plebis by “a city deputy”, we should convey a very imperfect, and, in some respects, a false idea of the office. In some instances, indeed, the error may be of considerable consequence. We render the Latin term Jugerum, by the English word “Acre.” It will not be doubted, however, that when we translate the Licinian or Agrarian law, “Ne quis plus quingenta jugera agri possideret”, Liv. vi. 35. “That no person should possess more than fifty acres of land”, an Englishman and a Roman would form different estimates of the quantity, when it is considered, that thirty-one English acres are nearly equal to fifty Roman, taking the Roman foot at 11. 6 of our inches. Hence, as I have remarked, some translators have ventured to employ the word Acre, to denote an English acre.

Again. If we recur to a periphrasis, we not only impair the strength and the vivacity of the expression, but also perplex the reader by a multiplicity of words. Who would not prefer Dictator, to “A person chosen in cases of imminent danger, in whom, for a limited time, was vested the sovereign authority of the state”? Can any barbarism be so offensive, as would be the constant repetition of this periphrasis? Who, for the same reason, would not prefer Parochus for a “Parish priest”, rather than adopt the tedious periphrasis, which would be necessary to express it in Latin, and which, after all, would fail to convey to a Roman a correct idea of the office?

But periphrasis is in general not only hostile to strength, to vivacity, and frequently even to perspicuity itself; but it likewise often leads an ordinary reader into erroneous conceptions. Were we to render the following passage, “Præmium, libero impunitatem ejus rei et sestertia ducenta decrevere”, (Sall. B. C. Cap. 31.) “They decreed as a reward, one thousand six hundred and fourteen pounds eleven shillings and eight pence”; it might impress the mere English reader with a belief, that the Romans were wonderfully scrupulous and exact, in estimating the merit of public services, since they descended in their rewards to the accuracy of pence; or that there was something very peculiar in the present case, which required this extraordinary minuteness, in specifying the sum. On the other hand, were we to attempt to render English money by Roman coins, we should find it, in some cases, impracticable, if perfect accuracy were required ; and in most instances the translation would, by reason of the fractional parts, be insufferably awkward. I observe, at the same time, that, where perfect accuracy is not requisite, and where the given sum, or quantity in English, corresponds pretty nearly to a certain number of Roman coins, weights or measures, translation may then be properly adopted. “ Three acres ”, for example, may, with a very trifling error, be rendered by Quinque jugera.

In the preceding account of untranslateable terms, I omitted to mention certain names of relationship. We have in our language the generic term, Relative or Relation, to denote relationship either by consanguinity or by affinity: but we have no specific names for Agnatus, “ a relation by the paternal line ”; Cognatus, “ a relation by the maternal line ”, and Affinis, “ a relation by marriage.” We have the terms, “ Uncle ” and “ Aunt ”, to express, the one “ a father’s ” or “ a mother’s brother ”, the other “ a father’s ” or “ a mother’s sister.” The Romans, however, had a distinct name for each. “ An Uncle ” or “ Father’s brother ” was called Patruus, “ A mother’s brother ” Avunculus, “ An Aunt ” the father’s sister Amita, “ An Aunt ” the mother’s sister Matertera. They likewise had distinct names for the degrees of lineal consanguinity, to a greater extent, both ascending and descending, than we have ; thus, they had the terms Pater, Avus, Proavus, Abavus, Atavus, and Tritavus, in retrograde succession ; and counting forwards, they had Filius, Nepos, Pronepos, Abnepos, Trinepos. We have “ Father ”, “ Grandfather ”, “ Son ”, “ Grandson.” On the other hand, there are certain degrees of relationship among us, for which the Romans had no correspondent distinct names. The English terms, therefore, are not translateable into the Latin language, but by periphrasis. To express “ a brother’s or a sister’s son ”, we say, “ nephew ”; “ a brother’s or sister’s daughter ” we call “ niece.” The former they expressed by Fratris filius, Sororis filius; the latter by Fratris filia, Sororis filia.

From the preceding observations, it must be sufficiently manifest, that, as the combinations of ideas are as various, as the moral and physical circumstances, in which we are placed, and as this diversity must necessarily affect the language which we speak, giving birth to terms in one country, to which there are none, in any degree correspondent, or none precisely equivalent in another, all translation must be in some measure imperfect, and in certain cases impracticable. Hence may appear the difficulty of the translator, whose duty it is to exhibit a correct and faithful transcript of his author. When the language, which he employs, fails in furnishing him with equivalent expressions, the selection of such terms, as are nearest to the sense and spirit of the original, requires no common share of critical sagacity.

In connection with the principles, which we have endeavoured to explain, it may be further observed, that not only do languages differ, one from another, in regard to individual terms, but that there is also a diversity in their general character, each exhibiting the national habits and intellectual condition of the people, by whom it is spoken.

Words are signs of thought; they are the exponents of our feelings, our perceptions, our ideas. They take their character, therefore, from the minds, whose sentiments they indicate. All those terms, which we employ, to denote the characters of style, strictly belong to thinking and its modes. Whatever affects the mind, or its intellectual habits, has a correspondent influence over our modes of expression. Our feelings, our sentiments, our associations, and habits of thought are, in a great degree, governed by conversation, by reading, and by the prevailing cast of mind in the people, among whom we live. Hence chiefly arises national character.—Similar habits of thinking among a whole people lay the foundation of national style; and so necessary is the connection between them, that we may reason from our knowledge of the latter, to the character of the former, with moral certainty. There is no person conversant in the languages of the Greeks and Romans, if he possess a moderate share of penetration, who cannot read in the style of each the intellectual and moral habits of the two nations. Every country has a language suited to its wants, and conveniences; it has also a peculiarity of diction, originating in its peculiar temper and genius. One language is familiar, another is stately; one breathes a spirit of submission, another assumes the tone of boldness and independence; one abounds in expressions of compliment, another is remarkable for honest simplicity; one is the language of war, another of love; one is harsh and rugged, another soft and harmonious. This diversity, in the genius of different languages, creates a correspondent difficulty in rendering a sentiment from one tongue into another, so as to preserve the tone and manner of its author, and the character of the garb, in which he has clothed it. Had Terence himself left behind him a translation of Aristophanes's "Plutus," his version would have been deficient in the ease, the freedom, and the familiarity of the original. The stateliness of the Roman language, ill adapted to comic sentiment, could not possibly, in the hands of any master, have been made to bend, so as to assume the pliability, and easy freedom, which characterize the style of the Grecian dramatist. And, though the complimentary phraseologies, common among us, and peculiarly characteristic of the French language, may be regarded as mere forms of civility, and certainly not to be literally understood, yet, considered as mere expressions of politeness and condescension, they are incapable of translation into the languages of antiquity. Nothing certainly can be less controvertible, than that the Greeks and Romans were utter strangers to that servility of spirit, which originally dictated these modish and complimentary phrases.

But, though an identity in laws, manners, and general habits of thinking, must produce a correspondent similarity in modes of expression, and though these causes have a uniform and universal influence, yet they are partially counteracted by the particular cast of mind, and the peculiar circumstances, in which different individuals are placed.—Hence arises that diversity of style, which we cannot fail to observe, in different authors of one and the same country. And as there are marked and predominant features, which distinguish the style of one country from that of another, so, on the contrary, we find, that similar peculiarities of genius, and mental constitution, exist in different individuals of different nations, and give birth to a very perceptible similarity in their modes of expression. And when two congenial minds in different countries attempt the task of mutual translation, it is in such cases, that the nearest approach to a perfect delineation of the author may be expected, the sentiment, the spirit, and the manner of the original being preserved, as far as the languages can be made to harmonize.

To this principle, as is justly observed by an ingenious writer, may be ascribed the excellence of Rowe's translation of Lucan, and several of Swift's imitations of Horace*. But the prosecution of this subject would occupy more space, than our limits will admit. Suffice it to observe, that there is a national style, or mode of expression, created by national habits of thought, which it is impossible to copy with perfect precision into the language of a people of different moral and intellectual character.

* Dr. Burrowes. See Transactions of the R. I. Academy, vol. v.

Having offered these general observations on the nature and the difficulty of translation, that the reader may clearly perceive, what is denied him, and what permitted him to accomplish, I shall conclude with suggesting a few plain and general rules, adapted to the capacity of the junior reader, and regarding rather the mechanism, than the philosophy of translation.

CHAPTER V.

OF ANGLO-LATIN TRANSLATION.

IT has been already recommended to the reader, carefully to avoid all barbarisms. He has also been admonished not to employ any Latin word, in a sense foreign to classic usage. This error frequently occurs in modern Latin. We have Communiter, for example, used for Vulgo, Asserere for Affirmare, and Iterum for Vicissim.

The first admonition I would now offer, is carefully to avoid transferring into Latin any idiomatical expression in his own language. We say, in English, for example, “To supply any one with any thing,” but he must not say, Suppeditare aliquem aliquam re- but aliquid alicui. In English, we say, “To communicate any thing to any one,” but the Latins said, Communicare aliquid cum aliquo. We say, “All of you are,” the Latins said, Vos omnes estis. We say, "Was it you?" they said, Tun' eras? We say, "What a glorious day!" they said, Quam pulchra dies! "Some young fellows of us met," Aliquot adolescentuli coimus. "How many are there of you?" Quot estis. "Who is here?"—"It is Chremes," Sun Chremes.

2dly. He should translate phrases into phrases, and not literally. We say, for example, "I take it in good part." This must not be rendered, In bona parte capio, but Boni consulo—"On purpose," not In proposito, but De industria—"He betook himself to his heels," not Se in calces recepit, but In pedes se conjecit.—"It is worth your while," not Tempore dignum est, or Temporis pretium est, but Operæ pretium est.—"Go to the gallows," not Vade ad patibulum, but Abi in malam crucem. The reader must almost intuitively perceive the necessity of observing this rule. He would smile, were he to hear a Roman translate, Rem acu tetigisti, "You have touched the thing with the needle," instead of "You have hit the nail on the head." Nor would his risibility be less excited, if he should hear him translate Scapulas perdidii, "I have lost my shoulder blades," or Feci stipendum, "I made pay." It is possible, indeed, the Roman might, in the true spirit of some modern critics, attempt to justify these translations. He might tell us, perhaps, that Perdere generally signifies to "Lose," and that the English verb frequently denotes not absolute loss, but harm or injury sustained, as when we say of a person smitten with love, “ He lost his heart,” and, therefore, by analogy we may say of a person, whose back was smitten with a rod, that “ He lost his shoulder blades.” He might, perhaps, tell us also, that as we say, “ To make a fortune,” it is allowable also to say, “ He made pay.” Such an argument as this might appear to him sufficiently conclusive ; but, addressed to an Englishman, it could only produce a smile. It is to be remembered, then, that we are guilty of a similar error, if we translate a vernacular phrase into a foreign language, word for word. Hence it follows—

3dly. That we ought not to employ any phrase in Latin, unless positively sanctioned by classic authority. We find analogy sometimes pleaded in favour of phrases, which do not occur in any good Latin writer. But analogy, it is to be remembered, is always an uncertain and dangerous guide. We have no evidence, by which to ascertain, what was, and what was not, deemed by the Romans good Latin, but classic usage ; and any phrase, how agreeable soever to analogy, if not found in a classic writer, we have reason to reject. Nothing but the express authority of a Latin author, who uses the identical phrase, can justify us in employing it. Cicero says (in Verrem), ad dextram sedere, “ to sit at the right hand,” but it would be an erroneous conclusion to infer, that we can say ad mensam sedere, “ to sit at table.”—What should we think of a foreigner, who should say, “ He made hatred to the lady,” and contend that it was good English, being strictly agreeable to analogy, because it is allowable to say, “ He made love to the lady.” Would such an argument serve to prove, that the expression is English ? Surely not.—Much less would it convince a native of this country, that it belonged to the language, which he was daily in the habit of reading, and hearing.

4thly. When we use a Latin phrase, it is indispensably necessary, that we attend to the strict and literal meaning of the terms, of which the phrase is composed. A constant regard to this rule will secure the Latin writer from many errors and inaccuracies, which he would be otherwise prone to commit. In illustration of this rule, let us take the following example—Dare pœnas, means “ To suffer punishment.” A superficial attention to the meaning of the terms, might incline the translator to imagine, that the phrase signifies “ To give punishment,” or “ To punish.” The very reverse, however, is the fact. The expression strictly denotes, “ to give satisfaction,” “ to give, or make, an atonement.” Dedit patri criminis pœnas, means “ He made an atonement,” or “ gave satisfaction to his father for the crime;” that is, “ He was punished by his father.” Agreeably to this construction of the terms, Petere pœnas, means “ To demand satisfaction,” “ to require an atonement,” or “ to inflict punishment.” Hence it is evident, that, if the translator, from inattention to the literal signification of the terms, and misled by the English phraseology, were to render “He received the punishment due to his crime,” by Pœnas meritas accepit, instead of Pœnas meritas dedit, he would be guilty of an egregious error; and, as far as his own expression were admissible, would denote the very reverse of that, which he intended to signify.

5thly. In translating, it is necessary to observe, that tropes and figures cannot always be transferred from one language into another; in other words, the figurative terms cannot, in every instance, be literally translated. For example, the Latins said, Ferro occisus est, to denote, “He was slain by a sword”; but we cannot transfer the synecdoche, and say, in English, “He was slain by iron.” To explain the origin of tropes and figures, as partly created by necessity, partly adopted from convenience, and partly introduced as subservient to beauty, elegance, vivacity, and strength, would lead us too far from our present purpose. Suffice it to observe, that tropes and figures being founded in the relation which one object of thought bears to another, and the laws of mental association being the same in all men, a very close resemblance exists between different languages, in respect to the figurative employment of words. Hence a term, figuratively used in one language, frequently admits a literal translation into another, without violating the figure. Of this fact, it would be easy to adduce a great variety of examples. We shall content ourselves, however, with the few following:—

We say, in English, “The pillar of the family,” denoting, by metaphor, the person by whom the family is supported. “I have read Virgil,” where Virgil by metonymy is put for “the works of Virgil.” “He drank the cup,” where, by the same figure, the Cup is put for the liquor, which it contained. “Warlike Rome;” where, by metonymy also, the city is put for its inhabitants. “The keel plows the sea;” the keel, a part of the ship, being used by synecdoche to express the whole. “Hannibal was conquered,” where Hannibal is put for the Carthaginian army. “They drink the Tigris,” the whole, by the same figure, being taken for a part.—We say also, “The angry sea,” “The tide rages,” “A tenacious memory,” “A fruitful genius.”—These expressions all admit a literal translation into Latin, the correspondent terms having, in both languages, the same literal and figurative acceptation; thus, “Columen familiæ.” Ter. “Virgilium legi.” “Poculum bibit.” Tibul. “Ferox Roma.” Hor. “Carina sulcat.” Virg. “Hannibal victus est.” Liv. “Tigrim bibunt.” Virg. “Iratum mare.” Hor. “Æstus furit.” Virg. “Tenax memoria.” Quint. “Ingenium ferax.” Cic.

In these, and numberless other examples, which might be adduced, the two languages concur in respect to the literal, and the figurative, acceptation of the terms. But this coincidence does not universally obtain. Were we, for example, to render Obtusa pectora, “Blunt breasts.” Acutum caput, “A sharp head.” Ferro flammeaque, “With iron and flame.” Calix fœcundus, “A fruitful cup;” our translations would be obscure, if not completely unintelligible. On the other hand, a figurative expression, in English, will not always admit a literal translation into the Latin language. We say of a person, endued with great affection and benevolence, "He has a warm heart;" but were we to render this by Calidum cor, we should convey a very different idea from that, which the original expresses. The word sail, in English, is, by synecdoche, frequently employed to denote the whole ship—and we say in our language, "I perceive two sail," or "three sail." But can this be rendered in Latin by Duo vela, Tria Vela? Certainly not. The term velum denotes simply the "sail," or "canvass," and is never figuratively employed to signify the whole ship. Or, to borrow another illustration from sea language, we may say, in English, "All hands were on board," where the term Hands is by a synecdoche put for Mariners; but in Latin we must render it by Omnes nautæ, and not Omnes manus.

6thly. Ambiguities in construction should be carefully avoided. If we say, Mihi persuadendum est tuo fratri, it is impossible to ascertain, whether the meaning be, "I must persuade your brother," or "Your brother must persuade me." When Phormio says, "Quot homines me deverberasse censes?" Ter. Ph. ii. 1, 13, the context only can explain, whether he means, that he had been the agent, or the person, who suffered. The former ambiguity might be removed, by saying, Mihi tuum fratrem persuadere oportet, or Me tuo fratri persuadere oportet, according to the sense intended. Ambiguities of the latter kind are generally prevented by turning the verb into the passive voice—thus, Ab hominibus me deverbatur esse, or Homines a me deverbatos esse censes? The latter is the meaning intended by Phormio.

7thly. In English, there is a vast number of words, which we have transferred from the Latin language, or some, perhaps, more immediately from the French, assigning them an English termination. Thus, Virtue, Vice, Temperance, Fortitude, Piety, are evidently of Latin extraction. That these are precisely equivalent to the terms Virtus, Vitium, Temperantia, Fortitudo, Pietas, the young scholar is very naturally apt to conclude. This is an error, against which it is necessary most particularly to caution him. These words are not respectively equivalent, the Latin terms having all of them a more extensive signification than the correspondent English words. Temperantia, for example, includes Continentia, Clemencia, Modestia, whereas the word Temperance is confined to the government of appetite. See Cic. de Invent. lib. ii. The reader, therefore, should bear in mind, that, though a term may be transferred from one language into another, this furnishes no certain evidence that it has been adopted, or is used, in its primitive import.

8thly. The translator must attend to precision in the choice of his words; employing such as express neither more nor less, than the sentiment intended. If we say, for example, Iracundus for Iratus, we denote too much; the former indicating an habitual temper, or disposition, the latter a transient state. If we employ Credere for Pro certo habere, we say too little; the former implying simple belief, on whatever authority it may be founded, the latter a firm conviction, established, as we conceive, on irrefragable evidence. If we use Combussit for Incendit, we express too much; if we use them conversely, we say too little.

Precise equivalence of expression is indispensably necessary to fidelity of translation. Nor can any excuse justify a translator for employing a word either more or less forcible, more or less comprehensive, than the original term, but the incapacity of the language to furnish an expression precisely equivalent.

GYMNASIUM,

SIVE

SYMBOLA CRITICA.

OBSERVATIONS.

ON the subject of synomyms we would request the attention of the reader to one general preliminary remark. It may be confidently affirmed, that in no language shall we find any two words precisely equivalent. If they agree in expressing the same primary conception, they differ in the accessory ideas, with which it is associated. Even, when the two terms express one simple and familiar object of perception, we find, that the principles of good taste sometimes forbid the use of one, while the other may be employed without offence. A term, also, as has been observed, may be admitted in one species of style, or with one intention on the part of the writer, which, in other circumstances, an author of judgement would be careful to avoid. Vulgarity and meanness are attached to some words, elegance and dignity form the character of others.

But, though no two words are precisely equivalent, it would be an error to infer, that, when no obscurity or misconception is to be apprehended, a writer may not be justified in employing either the one or the other, as the moment may suggest, or his judgement dictate. The acknowledged rules of composition admit this licence, and even sometimes require the adoption of the less appropriate sign. But from this indiscriminate use, it would be an error to conclude, that the words are in every respect precisely synonymous. In English, for example, we may, in many cases, use the terms design and intention, value and worth, small and little, to suffer and permit, indifferently, without any injury to the sentiment; but it would betray ignorance to maintain, that the words respectively are exactly equivalent. We say indifferently, “a clear sky,” and “a serene sky,” but the adjectives are not synonymous: for we may say “the water is clear,” but we cannot, without great impropriety, say, “the water is serene.” This remark it may be useful to bear in remembrance.

MURUS.

MŒNIA.

PARIES.

Murus has been defined by Pompontius and some other critics to be “Ambitus lapideus urbem cingens.” —The term, however, has certainly a more extended signification, denoting in general a wall for fencing or inclosing. It is chiefly, indeed, applied to a city or a camp; but is sometimes used to denote also the wall of a house—and, according to Dumesnil, the wall of a garden: “Cingere muris oppida.” Virg. Ecl. v. 32. “Urbem latior murus amplecti.” Hor. De Art. Poët. 208.—“Nec communione parietum, sed propriis quæque (domus) muris ambirentur.” Tac. Ann. xv. 43.—“Hic murus aheneus esto.” Hor. Epist. i. 1. 60.

Mœnia, from Munire, anciently Mœnire (see Voss. Etym.) denotes strictly “battlements or fortifications.” “Quum pœne inædificata in muris ab exercitu nostro mœnia viderentur.” Cæs. B. C. ii. 16.—“Ut mœnibus ligneis se munirent.” Nepos in Them.—“Dividimus muros, et mœnia pandimus urbis.” Virg. Æn. ii. 234. Hence it signifies “A fortified wall,” including Murus with the battlements constructed on it. “Unis circumdatum mœnibus.” Cic. de Leg. lib. iii.

Mœnia is sometimes, but very rarely, employed to denote the houses of a city. This meaning has been assigned to it by some critics in the passage just quoted from Virgil. But we are inclined to think, with Facciolati, that such deviation from the usual interpretation is here unnecessary; nor will the passage “fusi per mœnia Teucri,” as occurring afterwards, suffice to justify this deviation; for in both these the term may refer to the fortifications only. But when we read of the horse, after being drawn into the middle of the city, “Arduus armatos mediis in mœnibus astans Fundit equus,” it may be presumed, that Mœnia here means the houses. At the same time, when we consider that it was stationed in the citadel, the signification even here becomes somewhat doubtful. In the passage quoted from Florus, Salmasius reads, “intermœnia muro amplexus est.” Lib. i. Cap. 4. That the word, however, in one or two instances, is more applicable to houses than fortifications appears from Plin. vi. 26. and Vitruv. viii. 4.

Murus was intended merely for defence, or to prevent invasion—Mœnia served also to annoy the assailants: the former protected solely by its height and stability, the latter by its turrets and battlements.

Paries denotes a wall for upholding or supporting.—“Parietes fornicum perfossi urbem patefecerunt.” Liv. xliv. 11. Here it denotes the walls sustaining the arches. “Quippe viginti lati parietes sustinent,” Q. Curt. v. 1, “the walls upholding the hanging gardens of Babylon.” Hence its most common acceptation, “the wall of a house,” signifying also the partitions, which separate the apartments. “Ut subsidia reprimendis ignibus in propatulo quisque haberet, nec communione parietum, sed propriis quæque muris ambirentur.” Tac. Ann. xv. 43. To enable the junior reader to understand this passage, it may be necessary to observe, that by one of the laws of the Twelve Tables it was enacted, in order to promote a free circulation of air, and to prevent the spread of fires, that a space, not less than two feet and a half, should be left vacant between every two houses. This law, in process of time, fell into disuse; the consequence of which was, that the houses being built contiguous one to another, and without party walls, when a fire took place it spread with the greatest rapidity. To remedy this evil was the purpose of the law, which has been just now quoted. By Communio parietum is here signified "A party-wall."

URBS.

CIVITAS.

The former refers principally to the houses, the latter to the inhabitants. "Notavit Nonius, quod Urbs sit ædificia, Civitas incolæ." Vavassor. "Civitas est hominum, sed Mœnia dicimus urbem." Mancinellus. "Cum ne vestigium quidem Asiæ civitatum, atque urbium relinquatur." Cic. in Som. Scip. "Cœtus hominum jure sociati, quæ civitates appellantur." Ib. "Conventicula hominum, quæ postea civitates nominatæ sunt, tum domicilia conjuncta, quas urbes dicimus, mœnibus sepserunt." Cic. pro Sext. This distinction, however, is not universally observed. Cicero himself sometimes neglects it. See Gruter, vol. iii. p. 423.

The termination ing, though generally, is not always a sign of the active voice. The present participle, or, as it should be more properly called, the imperfect participle, in our language, belongs in common to both voices, active and passive. It denotes simply, that the action or state spoken of, is progressive or imperfect. It refers either to past, present, or future time, signifying, that the action relatively present at any of these times was, is, or will be, incomplete, or proceeding. It should therefore be properly called the imperfect participle, in contradistinction to the participle in ed, which denotes the perfection of the state or action spoken of, and is therefore called the perfect participle. The participle in ing, therefore, being common to both voices, the reader, in order to ascertain, whether the Latin verb should be put in the active, or the passive voice, ought to inquire whether the nominative to the verb express a subject acting, or suffering. If the nominative to the verb be acting, the Latin verb must be in the active voice; if the nominative be suffering, or acted upon, the Latin verb must be passive, thus: "John is building," Joannes ædificat. "The house is building," Domus ædificatur. The English verb is the same in both examples: but in the former John is active, and in the latter, the house is passive. The Latin verb, therefore, in the one example is active, and in the other passive. 2dly. When the nominative to the verb is suffering, or acted upon, and the state of suffering is expressed as incomplete, the present or imperfect participle being employed in English, one of the simple passive tenses must be used in Latin. When the state is represented as complete, the perfect participle being employed in English, one or other of the compound tenses, that is, the perfect participle, with the verb sum, must be used in Latin, thus: "The house is building," Domus ædificatur. "The house is built," Domus est ædificata. "The house was building," Domus ædificabatur. "The house was built," Domus erat ædificata. "Dinner is preparing," Prandium paratur. "Dinner is prepared," Prandium est paratum.

EXERCISE.

The Athenians were building the walls of their city. This thing the Lacedemonians took amiss; but Themistocles deceived them by the following stratagem. He went to Sparta, as an ambassador, and denied to the Lacedemonians that the walls were building. "But," says he, "if you do not believe me, send trusty men, who may inspect the city, and in the mean time do ye detain me." They did so.

OBSERVATIONS.

CLAM.	OCCULTE.	SECRETO.
-------	----------	----------

Occulte latent—Clam celant—(Fronto)—Clam, “Without the knowledge of”—Occulte (quasi ab oculo) “Without being seen”—Secreto (seorsim cernere) “Apart,” “by one’s self”—(Dumesnil). The author’s fancied connection between occulte and oculus is wholly inadmissible. The supposition is irreconcileable with every acknowledged principle of analogy*.

* The translator perceiving, it is presumed, the absurdity of this supposition, and believing it perhaps to be a typographical error, represents Dumesnil as saying, “quasi ab occulo.” But, when he hazarded this alteration, it evidently did not occur to him, that there is a palpable impropriety in saying occultus quasi ab occulo, both being parts of the same verb, and therefore the same impropriety in saying “occulte quasi ab occulo.” No etymologist would say amatus quasi ab amo. It must also have escaped his recollection, that Dumesnil expressly derives occulo, Clam denotes “ privately, secretly, or without being seen or known by any person.” It is opposed to palam. Illac per hortum circuit clam, ne quis se videret huc ire familiarium. Plaut. Asin. iii. 3. 152. Pompeius clam et noctu; Cæsar palam atque interdiu omnia faciebat. Cæs. B. C.

Occulte, derived from occulere, denotes likewise “ in a private or hidden manner;” but implies also pains and circumspection, in order to escape observation. In this respect it differs from clam, which denotes simply “ without the knowledge of.” It is opposed to aperte. Secreto, from secernere, means “ apart,” or “ by one’s self.” “ Secreto hoc audi; tecum habeto.” Cic. Fam. Ep. lib. vii.

In English a future and contingent event is often expressed as either present or past, the indicative mood being employed, without the note of contingency or futurity. Thus, “ Donec tibi id, quod pollicitus sum, effecero.” Ter. Ph. iv. 1. 24. “ Until I do, or have done, that which I promised;” that is, “ shall have done.” “ He ordered him not to advance, till he had refreshed his troops.” “ Ne longius progrederetur imperavit, donec copias refecisset;” that is, “ until he should have refreshed.”

For the general direction of the scholar, it may be useful here to offer this general preliminary remark, that verbs of the following significations govern the however erroneously, from oculus. In distinguishing abdere and occulere (Art. 4.) he says, Occulere (d’ oculus) ne pas laisser à la vue.

dative case. 1st, verbs signifying, “To profit or hurt,” except Lædo and Offendo, which govern the accusative. 2d, “To favour or help,” except Juro, which governs the accusative. 3d, “To command, obey, serve, or resist,” but Jubeo governs the accusative. 4th, “To threaten, or be angry with.” 5th, “To trust.” 6th, verbs compounded with satis, bene, and male. 7th, compounds of sum, except possum. In the following exercise, ut should be used after admonere.

EXERCISE.

Themistocles at the same time secretly despatched a messenger to the Athenians, advising them to detain the Lacedemonian inspectors at Athens, by whatever means they could, until they had built their walls, and had recovered him. The Athenians did as he advised them. Themistocles accordingly was recovered; the Lacedemonian inspectors were restored; and Athens was fortified, against the will of the Lacedemonians.

OBSERVATIONS.

Ut—“That” is used,

1st. After verbs of asking or requesting, as “Quod ut facias, etiam atque etiam rogo.” Cic. “Te etiam atque etiam oro, ut suscipias.” Cic.

2dly. After verbs of commanding—except jubeo, which, when signifying “to decree,” is followed by ut, and sometimes, though rarely, when it signifies “to order.” “Lictori, ut sibi appareret, imperavit.” Val. Max. “Imperat, ut jubeat.” Liv. “Id præcipiendum fuit, ut eam diligentiam adhibeamus." Cic. Impero, with an infinitive, has been rejected by some critics as inadmissible. A few examples however do occur. " Animo jam nunc otioso esse impero." Ter. And. v. 2. 1.

3dly. After verbs of advising—generally, as " Commonent Græci, ut faciamus judicem." Cic. " Hortor, ut te ad nos conferas." Cic. " Suadet ut nuptias maturem." Ter.

4thly. After verbs of causing, effecting, or happening—as " Effectum est, ut infinita pecuniæ cupiditas esset." Cic. " Accidit, ut ille subito interiret." Cic. " Fit, ut Cæsar prælium committere nolit." Cic.

5thly. After verbs of decreeing, as " Senatus dcernit, ut consules delectum habeant." Sall.

6thly. The conditions of an agreement or treaty, are expressed by ut. " Pacem conditionibus fecerunt, ne (ut non) quis imperator jus ullum in civem Campanum haberet, ut suæ leges, sui magistratus Capuæ essent, ut trecentos ex Romanis captivis Pœnus daret." Liv.

The preceding rules may be briefly expressed thus: that every request, every command, every advice, every effect, every decree, and the terms of every agreement, be expressed by ut.

7thly. All intensive words, as Talis, " such," Ita, Adeo, " so," Tantus, " so great," Tot, " so many," are followed by ut, as, " Aberam ita longe, ut nihil possem." Cic. " Adeo ignarus es, ut hæc nescias?" Cic. " Amor in nos tantus est, ut nihil supra possit." Cic.

8thly. Every purpose or intention may be expressed by ut; in other words, when the English word that means “in order that,” “with an intention, that,” “with the view of,” it may be expressed by ut, as “I read, that I may learn,” Lego ut discam. “He sent his son Marcus to be educated,” misit filium Marcum, ut institueretur, i. e. “for the purpose of being educated.”

It is to be observed, also, as a general rule, that when the verb preceding ut is in the present or future tense, the verb following ut must be put in the present subjunctive; and that, when the preceding verb is in any of the preterite tenses, the verb following must be in the imperfect, or perfect subjunctive. This rule will be further explained hereafter.

It may be necessary to inform the junior reader, that the verbs possum, volo, licet, oportet, and debeo, express the “ability, will, leave, obligation, or duty,” as either past or present; whereas in English these circumstances are always expressed, as either present or past, by the tense of the following verb, or by the same tense of both verbs. Thus “It can be done,” Fieri potest. “It could have been done,” Fieri potuit. “I may live,” Mihi vivere licet. “I might have lived,” Mihi vivere licuit. “I ought to go,” Me ire oportet. “I ought to have gone,” Me ire oportuit. “He says, that he can read,” Dicit, se legere posse. “He said, that he could read,” Dixit, se legere posse. In the two last examples, the ability is conceived as contemporary with the saying, or as relatively present, and is therefore expressed in the present tense of the infinitive mood. “ He says, or said, that he could have read,” se legere potuisse. The ability is here conceived as prior to the saying, and is accordingly expressed in the preterite or pluperfect of the infinitive mood. The following verb (legere) is in the present of the infinitive, the reading being necessarily contemporary with the ability, though in English it is expressed in the preterite tense. The difference of the English from the Latin idiom, in these examples, should be carefully attended to.

PETO. ROGO. POSCO. POSTULO.

In the two first editions of this work, relying on the accuracy of a quotation from Cicero, given by Dr. Hill, we expressed our concurrence in his distinction of poscere and postulare. He considers poscere as implying a claim, the validity of which is estimated by the claimant; postulare as denoting, that his demand is a matter of universally acknowledged equity. The quotation given by Hill is as follows, “ Nemo tam audax qui posceret; nemo tam impudens qui postularet,” omitting the concluding words of the clause, ut renderet. For the correction of this error I am indebted to an anonymous critic, (See New Edinburgh Review, No. VI.) who proposes the following distinction—Postulare signifies, “ To state and ask what is, or is conceived to be, right, reasonable, expedient, usual, or becoming, and differs from poscere only in this, that the latter, when the nominative is a person, points emphatically to the earnestness, with which he advances his reasonable, usual, &c. demand." According to this distinction, which we are inclined to think is well founded, as far as it goes, poscere is avide, seu instanter, postulare. But if no other distinction existed, we should find poscere and postulare applied to the same objects, the only difference being, that the verbs denote greater or less degrees of earnestness. This however is not the fact. Postulare is never used, where remuneration, price, or exchange, is denoted, which clearly shews, that there is at least something more implied in the distinction than the critic represents. Petimus precario, poscimus imperiose; postulamus jure. (Donatus.) Peto precario, gratis; Posco jure; Postulo caute. (Popma.) From the examples which we shall have occasion to adduce, it will be sufficiently evident, that these distinctions are not correct. Let us first inquire into the difference between petere and rogare. These verbs agree in denoting "to ask," but differ in this, that rogare signifies "to ask in order to be informed," and also "in order to obtain", whereas petere is by good writers, for the sake of perspicuity, restricted to the latter meaning. As synonyms they may be thus distinguished. Petere, in its primitive import, appears to denote simply "to aim at," or, in the vulgar phrase, "to go at" in order to reach or hit, and hence "to go" and "to attack." Accordingly, we find "cornu petere," (Virg.) "to aim at" or "butt with the horn." Quid petis? "what is your aim?" "What is your object?" Petere pœnas, "to aim at getting satisfaction." Petere malo—lapidibus—ferro, "to pelt with stones." "To attack with a sword." Petere somnum, "to endeavour after sleep." Petere aquam, "to go at, or after, water," "to fetch water."—Petere locum, "to go to a place." In all these various examples its primitive meaning is discoverable. Its proper signification, then, seems to be, "to aim at obtaining, or reaching." Hence, by a natural conception, it comes to denote, "to ask," admitting the various modifications of suppliciter, cupide, precibus, multis cum lacrimis, &c.

Rogare denotes, "to request as a favour respectfully, if not submissively." Seneca terms the word rogo, "grave et molestum verbum."^{*}

"Si non est grave nec nimis molestum Musæ Parthenium rogate vestrum."

Mart. v. 6.

Quid petitis? "What is your object?" "What do you ask?" said King Latinus to the Trojans.

"Diis sedem exiguum patriis littusque rogamus."

Virg. AEn. vii. 197—229.

—"Nudum et frusta roganter Nemo cibo, nemo hospitio, tectoque juvabit."

Juv. iii. 211.

* Dumesnil, in quoting this passage from Seneca, has molestum instead of molestum; but whether he had any authority for this reading, or whether it be a typographical error, I know not. A lexicographer of some eminence has disputed the justness of Seneca's remark. (See Martinii Lexicon.)

“ Pulsatus rogat, et pugnis concitus adorat.”

Juv. iii. 300.

“ Nec quicquam posthac rogaturus, salutem infeliciis filii rogo.” These are the last words of Piso, addressed to Tiberius. In these examples the verb clearly implies, that a favour is requested, and with a certain degree of respect or submission. It is this conception, we are inclined to think, which distinguishes it from petere, which signifies simply “ to ask.”

“ Poscere,” says Servius, “ est, secundum Varro, quoties aliquid pro merito nostro deposcimus.” Burmann, enlarging the acceptation, says, it is “ Jure aliquid exigere.” This right may be founded in usage, power, merit, or reciprocity. Usage, as when Martial says ;—

“ Ut poscas, Clyte, munus exigasque ;”

Mart. viii. 64. 1.

alluding to a present, on the anniversary of his birthday. Merit or reciprocity, as —“ Meritos poscit honores.”

Ov. Met. xiii. 594.

“ Poscere mercedes alieno lassus aratro.”

Juv. viii. 240.

“ Cujus equos pretium pro nocte poposcerat hostis.”

Ov. Met. xiii. 253.

In these examples we apprehend that postulare would be inadmissible.

The meaning of this verb (postulare), says Faciolati, is universally “ ostendere se velle, quocunque modo,” hence contendere. “ Incerta hæc si tu postules ratione certa facere.” Ter. Eun. i. 1. 16. “ If you strive, expect, or shew your wish.” The anonymous critic, to whom we have alluded, confines its signification to demands, which either are in fact, or are at least conceived to be, reasonable. In this opinion we cannot concur. “ Asiani, qui de Censoribus conduxerunt, questi sunt in senatu, se cupiditate prolapsos nimium magno conduxisse; ut induceretur locatio, postulaverunt.” Cic. Att. i. 16. This request Cicero pronounced to be “ invidiosa res, et turpis postulatio:” and it can hardly be imagined, that the complaining party could deem a reduction of rent to be, in their case, an equitable demand. The question “ Num iniquum postulo?” (Ter. Ph. ii. 3. 64.) clearly shews, that the object of postulare may be a demand which is conceived to be unreasonable. We consider poscere and postulare as each applicable to any claim or demand, whether equitable, or the contrary. The distinction between these two verbs, we conceive, is this; 1st. Postulare denotes a less degree of earnestness than poscere. Here we agree with the anonymous critic, and to this distinction we mean to restrict our concurrence in his opinion. “ Incipiunt postulare, poscere, minari.” Cic. in Verr. 2dly. It differs from poscere, as never implying any merit, remuneration, or usage, which, though not uniformly, is very generally signified by the latter verb. 3dly.

As applicable to things to be done, positions to be conceded, as well as things to be given. Poscere, as far as my observation has extended, seems inapplicable to speculative truths, and scientific concessions.

We shall now dismiss the subject with remarking, as a distinction uniformly observed, that petere is still farther distinguished from poscere and postulare, by its admitting no nominative, but a person; whereas they are construed also with inanimate things. “Petunt soli homines; poscunt et postulant etiam res inanimæ, ut locus, tempus, oratio.” Nolt. Lex. Ant.

As is often necessarily, as well as elegantly, rendered by pro. “They gave him his freedom, as a reward,” Libertatem pro præmio dederunt.

It is to be observed, that the person, to whom any thing is given or told, is put in the dative, whether the sign of the dative be expressed, or not. “He gave me a book,” Mihi librum dedit. “I told you this,” Hoc tibi dixi.

EXERCISE.

The father of a family came one day to Aristippus the philosopher, and asked him to undertake the education of his son. The philosopher demanding five hundred drachms as a fee; the father, who was a very covetous man, was frightened at the price, and told the philosopher, that he could purchase a slave for less money. “Do so,” said Aristippus, “and then you will have two.”

OBSERVATIONS.

To, after a verb or adjective expressing motion, or tendency to motion, or the contrary, is rendered by

ad. With, synonymous with the expressions “ along with,” “ in company with,” is rendered by cum.

Uterque denotes each of two taken individually; thus, Uterque vicit. “ Each conquered him,” implying, that each did it singly.

Ambo means “ the two ” (oi duo) taken together. “ Utrumque fecisse dicimus, si et hic, et ille fecerit divisim ; ambos fecisse dicimus, si duo conjunctim aliquid fecerint.” (Stephan.) This distinction, though generally, is not universally observed.

The English of the perfect participle of a deponent verb is “ having ;” of a passive verb, “ being ;” and of a common verb, “ having, or being.” Thus Locutus from Loquor is “ having spoken,” Lectus from Lego, “ being read,” Adeptus from Adipiscor, “ having or being obtained.” When the English is “ having,” and the verb deponent, the perfect participle of the Latin verb precisely agrees with the English. Thus, “ John having said these things, departed,” Joannes, haec locutus, abiit. Here locutus agrees with Joannes, and the Latin exactly coincides with the English idiom. When the Latin verb is passive, the English word having, in order to suit the Latin verb, must be turned into being; thus, “ John, these things being said, departed ;” Joannes, his dictis, abiit; in which example the pronoun hic being the nominative to no verb, nor the regimen of any word, is put with the participle (dictis) in the ablative absolute. If the Latin verb be common, both phraseologies are admitted. Thus, “ Having gained a great victory, he proceeded to Babylon." Magnam victoriam adeptus, Babylonem porrexit, or magna victoria adeptus, "a great victory being obtained."

It may be necessary to guard the junior reader against an error into which the English idiom, in the use of the verb "To join," would naturally lead him. If we say, "He joined his friend," the expression is ambiguous, implying either, that he united himself to his friend, or that he united, or joined his friend, to some other subject. In Latin, the person, or thing, joined, must be put in the accusative after the active verb, and the person, or thing, to whom or which it is joined, must be expressed in the dative. If the former meaning, therefore, be intended, we must say, Junxit se amico; if the latter, Junxit amicum.

EXERCISE.

Hasdrubal passed over into Italy with a great army; and, if he had been able to join his brother Hannibal, the Roman empire would have been ruined. But Claudio Nero, having left part of his army in his camp, hastened to Hasdrubal with a few chosen troops, and joined his colleague Livius at the river Metaurus. These two together vanquished Hasdrubal.

OBSERVATIONS.

INTERSUM.

ADSUM.

It is remarked by Harris, that prepositions transmute a portion of their meaning into words, with which they are compounded. If the remark is correct, as we believe it is, we should be inclined to infer, that interesse denotes a closer and more intimate relation, than adesse, the latter implying simply presence, and the former a more immediate intercourse, or a consociation in the state or condition of others. “ Turnus —urbi improvisus adest.” Virg. Æn. ix. 49. “ Jam nunciatum est hostes adesse.” Liv. Interesse in these examples would be inadmissible.

“ Mittit . . . mille viros, qui supremum comtentur honorem, intersintque patris lacrimis.” Virg. Æn. xi. 59. Here, on the contrary, we presume, adesse would be inapposite, “ who may be present, and participate in the father’s grief.” “ Voluerunt eos in suis rebus ipsos interesse.” Cic. in Verr. “ Should take a concern in their own affairs.” And, when Cicero says, speaking of Marcus Marcellus, “ Qui nunc Ædilis Curulis est, et profecto, nisi ludos nunc faceret, huic notro sermoni interesset,” (De Orat. lib. i.) we apprehend, that more is here implied, than if he had used the verb adesset. That the latter, denoting simply, “ To be present at,” may by inference signify “ being concerned in,” is not to be doubted; but the verbs are not therefore to be considered as synonymous.

By, before a person, denoting the principal agent, is rendered by a or ab, as “ Hector was slain by Achilles,” Hector ab Achille occisus est. When by denotes subordinate agency, it is rendered by per, as “ He sent a letter by a slave,” Literas per servum misit; passively, Literæ ab eo per servum missæ sunt. By before a thing is expressed in the ablative, without a preposition, and sometimes by per. Subordinate agency, indeed, or instrumentality, whether of a person or a thing, may be expressed by per, or by the ablative without a preposition, after an active or neuter verb, as “Per potestatem abstulit,” Cic. in Verr. “His jacet testibus,” Cic. i. e. a testibus prosternitur. “His ipsis, qui sub adversarii fuerant potestate, regios spiritus repressit.” Nepos in Dion.

No verb is used personally in the passive voice, unless it govern the accusative in the active voice. Thus, resisto governs the dative only in the active voice, and therefore has no passive voice, but impersonally. For example, we say Resisto tibi, “I resist you,” but we cannot say, Tu resisteris, “You are resisted,” but Resistitur tibi. Succedo, in like manner, governs the dative only in the active voice; Succedor, therefore, is not in classic use. “He was succeeded by Tullus Hostilius;” not Ille successus est a Tullo Hostilio, but Huic successit Tullus Hostilius, that is, “Tullus Hostilius succeeded him.”

The Kalends, Kalendæ, from an obsolete verb Calare, or Kαλεῖν, to call over, were on the first day of the moon or month; for Romulus began his months on the first day of the moon. On this day one of the inferior priests used to assemble the people in the capitol, and proclaim to them, that it was new moon, calling over at the same time the number of day, between the Kalends and the Nones. This was done, because it behoved the people, who lived in the country, to assemble in the city on the Nones of every month, in order to be informed by the “Rex Sacrorum” of the feasts and holidays; and to learn in general, what they had to do, in regard to sacred matters, during that month. The Nones fell on the 5th and the Ides on the 13th; but in four months of the year, namely, March, May, July, and October, the Nones fell on the 7th and the Ides on the 15th.

A point of time is expressed in the ablative; a space of time generally in the accusative. Macrobius remarks, that, in expressing a point of time, the Romans used, in early ages particularly, to distinguish past from future time, by employing the letter i instead of the regular termination of the numeral adjective. Thus, if past time was alluded to, they said die quarto, if future, die quarti, as “Die quinti Romæ in capitolium curabo tibi cœnam coctam.” Breve related to past time, brevi to future time. The words of the Prætor announcing the Compitalia were “Die Noni. Popolo. Romano. Quiritibus. Compitalia. Erunt. Quando. Concepta Fuerint. Nefas.” Aulus Gellius adds, “Die Noni prætor dicit, non die nono; neque prætor solum, sed pleraque omnis vetustas ita locuta est.”

It is to be observed, that the Romans, in computing their time, always included the day from which, and also the day to which, they reckoned; thus they called the 1st of January Kalendæ, the 31st of December Pridie Kalendarum, the 30th, not secundo, but tertio ante Kalendas.

The preposition a is used before consonants, ab before vowels, and abs before t and q. The letter h is not regarded as a consonant. Khunius, in his animadversions on Vorstius, has adduced two passages from Caesar, in order to prove, that abs is used before s; there is reason however to believe, that the readings, to which he appeals, are erroneous. In one of them, several ancient manuscripts give a, and in the other ab, instead of abs.

EXERCISE.

After him Julian obtained the government, and made war on the Parthians, in which expedition I myself was present. He took several towns of the Persians by storm, and received others on surrender. Returning victorious, he was slain by an enemy, on the sixth day before the Calends of July, and in the seventh year of his reign. He was a man of great eloquence, and had a very retentive memory. He was succeeded by Jovian, who was elected Emperor by the army.

OBSERVATIONS.

Will, when it simply denotes futurity, is generally rendered by the future indicative, and sometimes by the present potential; Would, in like manner, by the present or imperfect potential, according to the sense. When they denote inclination, they are rendered generally by volo. To enable the reader to understand, when he should employ the one, and when the other form of expression, he should learn to distinguish between the subjunctive and the potential mood. These two moods have in Latin one form. It is properly called the subjunctive mood, when it is subjoined to some adverb, conjunction or indefinite term, the English being at the same time indicative, naturally suggesting the same form in Latin. Thus, “I read,” Lego; “Because I read,” Quod legam. The English is indicative in both examples; but in the latter, the Latin verb is put in the subjunctive mood because it follows quod. “All men loved him,” Omnes eum amarerunt. “He was so benevolent, that all men loved him,” Adeo benevolus erat, ut omnes eum amarent. Though the English in both examples is indicative (“all men loved”), yet in the latter the verb is put in the subjunctive mood, because it follows ut. It is, then, in such examples only, that this mood should be called subjunctive. When it expresses what is contingent, or hypothetical, it is properly named the potential mood. Thus, “I would read, if it were necessary,” Legerem, si necesse esset. Here legerem is employed, not as subjunctive, or subjoined to any word requiring this form of the verb, but because the action is represented as contingent, or dependent. Thus the same form of the verb has two different names, subjunctive and potential. To this distinction Mr. Ruddiman has not sufficiently attended. When he gave Lego ut discam, “I read, that I may learn,” as an example of ut governing the subjunctive mood, he did not perceive that discam is here potential, and not subjunctive; that the English requires that form of the verb, and that the word discam is not affected by the preceding conjunction.

Now the present potential includes the expression of “may, can, will, and shall,” and the preterite imperfect of “might, could, would, and should,” implying the verbs licet, possum, volo, and debeo. Thus amem signifies not only “I may or can love,” but likewise, in dependent and in interrogative clauses, “I shall or will love.” Of this numberless examples might be produced; and the significations of the imperfect naturally lead us to assign the four correspondent meanings to the present tense. Thus “Non eam ?” Ter. Eun. i. 1. 1. “Shall I not go?”—“An potius ita me comparem ?” Ter. Eun. i. 1. 2. “Shall I rather so make up my mind?”—“Quisquam Junonis numen adoret ?” Virg. Æn. i. 52. “Will any one adore.”—“Erunt, qui reprehendant.” Cic. “There will be persons, who will blame.”—“Nascetur Cæsar, famam qui terminet astris,” Virg. Æn. i. 291. “Cæsar, who shall or will bound.”

That the reader may understand when he should employ the potential mood, and when the full expression by volo, possum, licet, and debeo, he ought to observe, that when the sentence, or clause, is absolute and independent, or in general when it is not followed, or preceded, by a subjunctive tense expressing a circumstance, on which the clause in question depends, the periphrasis with volo, licet, &c. must be employed. Thus,

- “ We will go,”
- “ They will not go,”
- “ I may come,”

- Ire volumus.*
- Ire nolunt.*
- Mihi venire licet.*

“ I can read,”	Legere possum.
	Legere debes.
“ Thou shouldst read,”	Tibi legendum est.
	Te legere oportet.

“ It might have been done” absolutely and	Fieri potuit. sometimes contingently.

Thus, “ It might have been done, if he had been taken,” Si captus esset, fieri potuit, or potuisset. On the other hand, the verbs possum, volo, licet, and oportet or debeo are suppressed ; in other words, the potential mood is used in the two following cases :

1st. It is frequently employed when the sentence is interrogative, thus, “ Shall I, or should I not go ?” “ Non eam ?” Ter. Eun. i. 1. 1.—“ Shall or should the insect Pantilius discompose me ?” “ Men’ moveat cimex Pantilius ?” Hor. Sat. i. 10.—“ What could I do ?”—“ Quid facerem ?” Virg. Ecl. i. “ Who could bear those men ?” “ Quis istos ferat ?” Cic. ad Brut.—“ Why would you go away ?” “ Cur abires ?”

2dly. When the clause is conditional, or dependent, as “ I might hold it, if I pleased,” Tenerem, si vellem.—“ You would think otherwise, if you were in this situation,” Si hic sis, aliter sentias. Ter. And. ii. 1. 12. “ He would have done it, if he had tried,” Fecisset, si tentasset.—“ He would not have come, if I had not ordered him,” Non venisset, nisi jussissem. In these examples, the mood occurs both as potential and subjunctive, the potential being dependent on the subjunctive clause. This rule will suffice at present for the direction of the junior reader. The subject will be hereafter resumed, when the real character of this form of the verb will be more fully explained.

Tenses of the Infinitive Mood.

Duration is continuous and absolute; time is in its own nature interrupted and relative. It is either present in regard to the past and the future; or past in regard to the present and the future; or it is future in regard to the present and the past. Hence tenses, which are general notations of time, express time relatively. This observation, as applicable to the present and preterite tenses of the infinitive mood, it will be useful to illustrate by a few examples:

“ He says, that I write,”
Dicit me scribere.

The leading verb expresses present time, and the following verb, being in the present tense, expresses time present, in relation to the time denoted by the preceding verb.

“ He said, that I wrote,”
Dixit me scribere.

Here the tenses in English and Latin do not mutually accord, the following verb being in the preterite tense in English, and in Latin in the present. The leading verb denotes past time; and the verb following being intended to express an action contemporaneous with that time, or present in relation to the time of saying, the present tense is, in conformity to that intention, employed in Latin. “ He said, that I wrote at the time he said so.”

“ He says, that I wrote,”
Dicit me scripsisse.

In the former example, “ I wrote,” was rendered by scribere; and here it is rendered by scripsisse. The reason is, the leading verb is present, referring to the present time: “ the writing,” however, was prior to “ the saying,” and is therefore expressed in the preterite tense. The actions here are not contemporaneous, and the priority of “ the writing” is expressed by a preterite tense, denoting a time antecedent to the present.

“ He said, that I had written,” Dixit me scripsisse.

Here the saying is preterite in respect to the present time, and the writing is prior to the saying; therefore while the latter is expressed in the preterite or perfect tense, the writing, being antecedent to that, is expressed in the pluperfect. And it is to be observed, that, when the leading verb is in the preterite tense, and the following verb in what is called the perfect or pluperfect of the infinitive, the meaning is always pluperfect, and is to be rendered by had. When the governing verb is present, this form of the infinitive denotes simply past time and perfect action ; Dicit nos audivisse, “ He says, that we heard.”—Dixit nos audivisse, “ He said, that we had heard.”

It may, therefore, be given as a general rule, that, when the following verb denotes an action or state contemporaneous with that of the leading verb, the present of the infinitive must be used, whether the tense of the leading verb be present, or preterite. If the leading verb be present, and the following verb denote an action prior to that, the following verb, to mark that priority, must be in the preterite tense. And if the leading verb express a past action, and the following verb denote an action antecedent to that, then the following verb must be in the pluperfect of the infinitive, and be translated by had. Inattention to this rule has produced such errors as the following : “ When Crœsus heard that Solon was in Lydia,” “ Cum Crœsus audiret, Solonem in Lydia fuisse,” Adams's Select. “ The hearing and the being” were contemporaneous circumstances; the verb should, therefore, be in the present of the infinitive. Fuisse implies an event antecedent to the hearing, and perfect before the other commenced. “ He believed that there is only one God,” Credidit fuisse tantum unum Deum. Ib. This expression violates two rules, 1st. The one here given, and 2dly. The rule, that all abstract propositions, or all propositions universally and immutably true, ought to be expressed in the present tense. The author’s Latin rendered into English denotes “ He believed, that there had been only one God.”

PRÆTOR.

The name of Prætor in the earliest ages of the Roman republic was common to all the magistrates. Even the consuls were designated by this appellation, and the Dictator is called by Livy (lib. vii. 3.) Prætor Maximus. The duties of office were not divided among the Romans in the infancy of their state, as they are with us. The same man might, at one and the same time, fill the offices of judge, priest, and commander of the army. The inconvenience of this, however, was soon felt; and in the year 389, the office of Prætor, strictly so called, was instituted, in order that justice might be regularly administered in the city, the consuls, on whom this duty devolved, being frequently absent in the prosecution of foreign wars. In the year 501 another prætor was added; and he, who had the administration of justice among the citizens, was called Prætor Urbanus; while the other had the charge of all matters relative to foreigners. The number was still further increased in the year 520, after the conquest of Sicily and Sardinia, two more being added, who should assist the consuls in the government of the provinces. After the conquest of Spain six were annually chosen; Sylla increased them to eight; Julius Cæsar to sixteen, and the second triumvirate to sixty-four.

EXERCISE.

Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, descended from a very noble family, would not suffer Scipio Asiaticus, though an enemy, to be carried to prison. The latter, when he was Prætor, subdued Gaul; in his first consulship he conquered Spain, and in his second Sardinia. When he was capitally impeached by the people, Sempronius swore, that he was not deserving of death; and that, if he were banished, he would go into exile along with him. Upon this he was acquitted.

OBSERVATIONS.

FORTE.

FORTASSE.

Tursullinus observes, that these words do not differ from each other in extraction, but in use and signification. Forte, he says, is the same as casu, denoting “by chance,” or “accidentally.” “We happened accidentally to be at Privernum,” “Forte evenit, ut Priverni essemus.” Cic. Fortasse, fortassis, and forsan, imply doubt and uncertainty, answering to the English word “perhaps.” “You have a letter longer, perhaps, than you would wish,” “Habes epistolam verbosiorem fortasse quam velles.” Cic. Ep. lib. iii.

It is to be observed, that casualty or accident is frequently expressed by forte, instead of accidit or contingit; thus, “I happened to be at home,” Forte domi aderam. Mihi contigit domi esse.

Forsan, Forsitan, are generally joined with the present subjunctive in such expressions as “You will, perhaps, ask,” Forsitan quæratis. Cic. “Some one, perhaps, will think,” Aliquis forsan putet. Ter. “They will, perhaps, wonder,” “Forsitan illi miren- tur." Sometimes with the preterite, as " Some one will, perhaps, say," Forsitan quispiam dixerit. Cic. Rarely with the future indicative, " Forsan et haec olim meminisse juvabit." Virg.

One followed by another is rendered by alius.

The indicative form in English is often used for the potential; thus, " It was decreed, that whosoever broke this law, should be put to death," Decretum est, ut, quicunque hanc legem violasset, necaretur: that is, " should break," or (properly,) " should have broken." This idiom requires particular attention.

It is a general rule, that the adjective be placed after the substantive; and also that the generic term precede the special, and the appellative the proper name: thus, urbs Roma, not Roma urbs. Fratres gemini, twins, not gemini fratres. If gemini be put first, the addition of fratres is superfluous; so says Quintilian; and the rule, which he gives, is founded in propriety. Cicero, however, says geminos fratres, lib. ii. De Divinat. Livy also, in the following narrative says, trigemini fratres. He has also used quis for uter, contrary to his usual practice, and to the distinction observed by classic writers generally.

EXERCISE.

A war having arisen between the Romans and Albans, under the conduct of Hostilius and Fufetius, before they came to a battle, it was determined to finish the affair by the combat of a few. There happened to be among the Romans three brothers, born at one birth, by name Horatii, and also three such among the Albans, named Curiatii, equal to them in age and strength. It was agreed, therefore, that these should fight for the mastery, and that the people, to whom the victors belonged, should have the supremacy.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIMULARE.

DISSIMULARE.

Simulare is “to pretend to be what we are not;” dissimulare, “to dissemble, or conceal what we are.” “Simulabat amicitiam, cum interim illi perniciem moliretur.” Cæs. B. G. “Si quis est paulo erectior, occultat et dissimulat appetitus voluptatis.” Cic. de Off. “Multa simulavi invitus; et dissimulavi cum dolore.” Cic. in Fam. It is the character of hypocrisy to pretend to virtues which it has not (simulare), and to dissemble the vices which it has (dissimulare). Catiline is described by Sallust, as “Simulator et dissimulator.”

UNA.

SIMUL.

These words are thus generally distinguished. “Simul notat conjunctionem respectu temporis; una respectu loci et facti. Unde dicuntur simul fuisse, qui eodem tempore fuerunt; una fuisse, qui in eodem loco fuerunt et facto.” Nolten. Lex. Ant. Simul, agreeably to this explanation, denoting “at the same time;” and una “in the same company,” we may say, “ambos una necavit; non tamen simul expirarunt.” (Dumesnil.) This distinction, however, is not uniformly observed. Cicero frequently uses simul for “together,” or in the same company. “Dummodo simul simus, omnia facile negligo." Cic. " Propter propinquitatem loci totos dies simul eramus." Cic. ad Att. But una is never used for simul.

"Together" is generally expressed by one or other of these adverbs. But in the following exercise, in which the word occurs, it is with more precision rendered by universi, denoting "all together." The termination of the adjective indicates the term, which it is intended to modify; the adverb being inflexible, might leave the subject uncertain, and create ambiguity.

EXERCISE.

They engaged; and, after many wounds given and received on both sides, two Romans fell, and the three Albans were grievously wounded. The single Horatius, who yet remained untouched, but was not a match for the Albans all together, in order to divide their strength, and attack them singly, pretended flight. They followed him, one after another, as their strength, and the pain of their wounds permitted; and as they came up, he slew them one by one. The Roman was accordingly the victor; and the two states were united under one name.

OBSERVATIONS.

SED.

AUTEM.

Whether the former of these conjunctions be the ancient word sedum (ex se et dum) abbreviated, or a contraction for se et, or se with d suffixed, it is agreed among all philologists, that the original word is the inseparable preposition. Its strict import seems to be, "laying this aside," "without this," hoc dimisso. Agreeably to this explanation, we find it in early ages, used for sine. “Sed frude facere,” i. e. “sine fraude.” “It implies”, says Vossius, “separation,” as atque or adque denotes addition. It may be easy to conceive, how it came hence to imply antithesis or contrariety, as “Non video nunc, sed vidi modo.” Plaut.; or a transition from one subject to another, as “Age, sed huc qua gratia te accersi jussi ausulta.” Ter. i. e. “dismissing this subject,” something previously mentioned, as nisi waives or excludes something that follows; as also concession, or correction, as “Sed ierit ad bellum; discesserit non a te solum verum etiam a fratribus.” Cic. But whence it came to imply addition, in consistency with its primitive signification, and in connection with one or other of these concomitant notions, unless by an ellipsis of etiam, it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to ascertain. How ast (adsit) at, atqui, words nearly synonymous*, but with this difference, as Mr. Potter observes†, that atqui is the most forcible, denote addition, implying at the same time the derivative meanings of sed, is sufficiently obvious.

* I concur with Mr. Tooke in considering ast, at to be contractions of adsit, and not derived from $\alpha\tau\alpha\zeta$, as some philologists conjecture. It may be remarked, that words often acquire an accessory meaning by ellipsis: When we say, “I saw but one,” the sense of the particle cannot be explained either by but or “be out.” The word none is understood, i. e. “none, one be out,” or “except one.” “He was generous, but economical.” The particle but or add would not mark the contrast of the two epithets; yet seems to be understood. In the same manner tamen is sometimes suppressed after sed and at. When particular emphasis is laid on the clause, it is introduced with attamen.

† Essay on “the Means of discovering the Senses of Words.”

Autem (αὐταρ, αὐτε from αὐ rursus) are kindred words, and denote addition, answering primitively to the Saxon hot or add, now confounded with but, or be out. Hence it is joined to porro, as porro autem, “more over,” and also with sed, as sed autem, “but again.” It states, observes the same critic, another view of the same case, but not like sed corrective of the former; nor interruptive, as at; or contradictive, as atqui. We would here remark, that it is, with peculiar force and elegance, used at the end of a clause or sentence. “Etsi intelligo, quam meum sit scire et curare, quid in republica fiat; fiat autem? imo quid futurum sit.” Cic. Att. “Sed ferendus tibi in hoc meus error; ferendus autem?” “To be borne, did I say?” “Imo vero etiam adjuvandus.” Cic. ad Att.

It has been already observed, that when the clause implying “will,” “liberty,” “ability,” or “duty,” is absolute or independent, the verbs volo, licet, possum, debeo, and not the potential mood of the principal verb, are to be employed. It sometimes happens, however, that the “inclination,” “liberty,” “ability,” and “duty,” are themselves contingent, or dependent. In such examples, the verbs, expressive of these, must be put in the potential mood: thus, “He said, that the man, who was unwilling to die for his country (or would not die) was unworthy of life,” qui pro patria mori nollet, “should be unwilling to die.”

Here, “was unwilling” is unobjectionable in English; for in our language the indicative is frequently used to express what is contingent; but in Latin it is inadmissible.

The cardinal numerals, “one,” “two,” “three,” unus, duo, tres, are to be distinguished from the distributive, Singuli, Bini, Terni, &c. The cardinal imply that the number spoken of belongs to all collectively, and is the whole amount. The distributives denote, that the number specified belongs to each individual, and is therefore only a part of the whole. Thus, Eutropius, speaking of the government of the senators after the death of Romulus, says, “Regnaverunt per quinos dies ;” not, “they reigned five days,” but “five days each.” In tres incidi mendicos, et dedi ternos asses. “I gave them three pence each.” Tres asses would imply, three pence among them, or a penny each.

Ni, nisi, “unless,” are elegantly used for si non.

For a comparative estimate of a Roman and an English acre, see “Preliminary Observations,” p. xci.

EXERCISE.

Curius Dentatus, having subdued the Samnites, said in an assembly, “I have taken such a quantity of land, that it would have been a desert, if I had not taken such a number of men; moreover, I have taken such a number of men, that they would have perished by famine, if I had not taken such a quantity of land.” He divided the fields among the soldiers, giving each between eight and nine acres, and reserved as many for himself; saying, that no man ought to be a general, who would not be content with the share of a common soldier.

OBSERVATIONS.

ILLE.

HIC.

When these pronouns are opposed to each other, Ille, “That,” denotes the one which is the more remote, or “the former;” Hic, “This,” “the nearer,” or “the latter.” Thus, “Ille bello, hic pace, civitatem auxerunt.” Liv. i. 21. This distinction, however, though subservient to perspicuity, is not uniformly observed by classic writers. “Vidi Hectorem et Achillem, hunc Trojanum, illum Græcum.” Cic. pro Rosc. Here Ille means the latter, and Hic the former. “Melior tutiorque est certa pax, quam sperata victoria, haec in tua, illa in Deorum manu est.” Liv. xxx. 30. (See also Val. Max. ii. 7. 12. Id. iii. 2. 1. Liv. xxiii. 29. Cic. de Fin. lib. iv.) No authority, however, can sanction an expression, which is either ambiguous or obscure, much less an expression, by which the reader, if unacquainted with the subject, would unavoidably be led into error.

The acute and ingenious critic, to whom I have recently referred, concurs in the general opinion, that ille means “the more remote,” and hic “the nearer of two subjects;” but he apprehends, that this distinction refers not to their place in the sentence, but only to their real or conceived local relation in the mind of the speaker, or writer. In this view of the subject he conceives, that critics have been too rash, in im-puting to some classic writers violations of the general rule. The passage quoted from the speech of Hannibal, "Melior tutiorque est certa pax, quam sperata victoria, hæc in tua, illa in deorum, manu est," he thus explains, "This present and immediate advantage, a sure peace, is in your power; that distant and far removed good is in the power of the gods, who may deny it." The explanation does not appear to me to be quite satisfactory. The author endeavours to reconcile with this notion of the subject, several other passages, in which the objectionable usage is adopted. Now, while we concur with him in thinking, that in two or three instances, classic writers have unjustly incurred the censure of modern critics, having been guilty of no violation of the common rule, we are still of opinion, that examples do occur, in which the canon has been improperly transgressed. The learned writer needs not to be informed, that to account for an anomaly, and to justify its adoption, are things very different. When the author of an essay on the writings of Pope says, "I wonder, that such a valiant hero as you should trifle away your time among women," it may be urged, that the pronoun your is here properly used, the conception of the speaker being directed to the person addressed; but, I believe, that most grammarians will, notwithstanding, pronounce this to be an error, the author having lost sight of the connection between the leading subject and its predicate. Besides, it may in many cases be difficult to ascertain, unless by precision of expression, what is more or less immediately present to the mind of the speaker ; and every speaker, who is desirous not to be misunderstood, will attend to what may be more or less present to the mind of the person addressed, which in this respect may be at variance with his own. Unless, therefore, in cases where misconception is impossible, the general rule, which precludes all ambiguity, should be observed. If we were to infer the meaning from our notion of what passed in the imagination of the author, we should frequently be left in doubt, if not led into error. We take the following passage, as an example, “ Nec vero cum duo Decii, aut duo Scipiones, fortis viri commemorantur, aut cum Fabricius Aristides re justus nominatur ; aut ab illis fortitudinis, aut ab his justitiae tanquam a sapientibus, exemplum petitur.” Cic. Off. 3. 4. Here the only bond of connection, which could enable us to ascertain, which of the two subjects was more or less immediately present to the writer’s imagination, is contiguity in time or place ; and it is evident that concluding on this principle, with no knowledge of the facts, our inference would be at least doubtful, if not false. Cicero, however, has expressed himself clearly ; and if we construe his words according to the general rule, we cannot possibly misunderstand his meaning.

Where the gender, or the number, of the pronouns clearly points to their respective substantives, we concur with Sanctius in admitting, that the pronouns may be used indiscriminately ; thus in the following passage, “ Quorum nescio, utrum majus dede-cus fuerit, quod patria spei, au quod hostis metus nihil in iis reposuerit; haec pro se, ille ne adversus se dimicarent, parvi pendendo." V. Max. 2. 7. The haec clearly points to patria, and the ille to hostis. But in every other case perspicuity requires, that the usual distinction should be observed.

The critic, to whom I have just referred, proposes another distinction, namely, that iste refers more closely than ille to the circumstances and conception of the person addressed. "Est istuc quidem Læli aliquid; sed nequaquam in isto sunt omnia." "What you say is something." "Venient igitur isti irrisores hujus orationis." "These your scoffers." There is ground, we believe, for this distinction*.

Iste holds a middle place between ille and hic, not meaning emphatically either this or that, but referring to something previously mentioned, or just about to be specified.

When the three pronouns hic, ille, and iste are used, hic refers to the nearest; iste to the middle one, and ille to the most remote. "Tullium, Atticum, et Trebatium vehementer diligo, hunc quidem (Trebatium) ob mores festivos; istum (Atticum) ob ingenii liberalitatem; illum (Tullium) propter incredibile dicendi flumen. (See Noltenius in hic.)

Quid and its compounds, Siquid, Aliquid, Numquid, &c. are considered by most grammarians as real substantives, because they are joined with a genitive case, as Quid negotii, Aliiquid novi. This seems to me a very insufficient reason; for, by the same rule, we should call Hoc, Illud, Id, and many adjectives, which in the neuter gender are joined to a genitive case, substantive nouns. It is more important, however to determine the difference, in respect to usage, between Quid and Quod, Aliiquid and Aliquod. In the earliest writers they are used indifferently. “Quid ego facinus audivi.” Plaut. Truc. ii. 4. 31. “Nisi occupo aliquid mihi consilium.” Id. Menæch. v. 2. 94. “Credo cum viro litigium natum esse aliquod.” Id. Mænech. v. 2. 15. In later writers, however, we find Quid with its compounds joined with a genitive case, and Quod agreeing with its substantive, as Quod pomum, Aliquod vinum—Quid negotii, Quid causæ, Aliiquid gratiæ. It is also more elegant to say, Optimum quidque, Aliiquid utile, Quiddam subagreste, than Quodque, Aliquod, Quoddam, the latter being rarely joined with an adjective. (See Despauper's Comment.)

* Ille is considered by Noltenius to denote dignity, and iste contempt; but this distinction, though frequently, is far from being uniformly observed.

It may be necessary to guard the junior reader against the error of understanding the word occasio to be synonymous with our term “occasion.” The former is never used by any classic of eminence to express “a time,” “an occurrence,” “a casualty” or “occasion,” but is of the same import nearly as the English word opportunity, or “convenient time.” “Occasio,” says Cicero, “est pars temporis habens in se alicujus rei idoneam faciendi, aut non faciendi op- portunitatem." Cic. de Inv. lib. i. In another passage he defines it thus: "Tempus autem actionis opportunum, Graece εὐκαιρία, Latine appellatur occasio." Cic. Off. i. 40. For the distinction between it and tempus, see Cic. de Inv. lib. i.

EXERCISE.

No man was ever milder than Scipio Africanus; and yet, from an opinion that some rigour was necessary for establishing military discipline, he was on one occasion cruel to his countrymen. For, after having conquered Carthage, and having reduced under his own power all those, who had gone over to the Carthaginians, he punished the Roman deserters with more severity than the Latin. The former he crucified as runagates from their country, and the latter he beheaded as perfidious allies.

OBSERVATIONS.

TUM.	INDE.	IGITUR.
------	-------	---------

Tum, "then," or "at that time,"—inde, deinde, "then," or "after that,"—Igitur, itaque, "then," or "therefore." Tum is frequently used for deinde.

"Ubi tempus tibi erit, sat habet, si tum recipitur." Ter. Eun. iii. 2. 31.—"An ego tibi obviam non prodirem? primum Appio Claudio; deinde Imperatori, deinde more majorum, deinde (quod caput est) amico?" Cic. Ep. lib. iii. 7. "Fortes igitur sunt habendi, non qui faciunt, sed qui propulsant injuriam." Cic. Off. i. 19.—"Primum igitur est de honesto, sed dupliciter; tum pari ratione de utili; post de comparatione eorum disserendum." Cic. Off. i. 4.

It may be here remarked, in passing, that cum, tum, strictly denoting two contemporaneous events, signify both, and; the former being generally applied to the less important of the two, and the words etiam, vero, maxime, quoque, certe, denique, præcipue often subjoined to the latter. “Cum omnes diligendi sunt, tum certe ii.” Cic. ad. Q. Fratrem, i. 1. “Cum spe summa, tum etiam majore animo.” Id.

Cum (quum), “when” generally governs the subjunctive mood; thus, “I was reading,” Legebam.—“When I was reading,” Cum legerem. The exceptions to this rule will be noticed afterwards.

EXERCISE.

When Porsena, king of the Hetrurians, was endeavouring to re-establish Tarquinius Superbus on his throne, and had taken the Janiculum at the first assault, Horatius Cocles, a man of the greatest courage, posted himself at the extremity of the Sublician bridge, and alone withstood the whole force of the enemy, till the bridge was broken down behind him. He then threw himself into the Tiber, and swam over to his friends, unhurt either by his fall, or the darts of the enemy.

OBSERVATIONS.

RENOVARE. REDINTEGRARE. INSTAURARE.

Renovare is “to renew,” or “make new what is old or disused.”—“Renovatur quod jam obsolevit.”—Redintegrare is “to make new and complete, what has been impaired.”—Instaurare (quasi instar alterius facere) "to renew or repeat the copy or impression." "Instauratur id, cuius simile jam existit." Dumesnil.—Macrobius (Sat. lib. i. cap. 11.) observes that Varro considers instaurare the same as instar novare.

Redintegrare implies more than renovare. "Ut renovetur, non redintegretur oratio"—Auctor ad Herennium.—Renovare frequently means nothing more than to revive, to resume any business which has been interrupted; "to begin it again," (denuo de novo,) at the point where we left off.—Redintegrare generally means "to renew," or "repeat from the beginning."—"Socii denuo in semet ipsos arma vexerunt." "Sic, quasi ex integro, nova Macedoniæ bella nascuntur." Justin. xv. 4. Here is evidently the same difference between denuo (de novo) and ex integro, as between renovare and redintegrare. The author qualifies ex integro "afresh," with the modifying term quasi. Denuo, "anew," or, "again," implying merely recommencement, requires no modification. In many cases these verbs may be used indiscriminately, as in the following exercise. Instaurare, renovare, redintegrare, "bellum," "pugnam," frequently occur in classic writers, expressing the same general idea of recommencement, or renewal.

Ne is elegantly used for ut non, as Ne faceret, obsecravi, "I besought him not to do it." For ne non, ut is elegantly used. Cave, ut facias, equivalent to cave, ne non facias. "Take care, that you do it."

Suadere, dissuadere, are construed with the dative of the person, and the accusative of the thing. “Gaudeo, te id mihi suadere.” Cic. Ep. ad Att. 15.

It may be worthy of remark, that classical writers, in detailing speeches or observations, either express them in the words of the speakers themselves, introducing them with the word inquit, or in their own words, omitting the formality of the verb dicere, thus, “Nunciate,” inquit, “regi vestro, regem Romanum deos facere testes.” Liv. i. 22. “Illi omnium ignari terunt tempus; se invitatos, quicquam, quod minus placeat Tullo, dicturos.” Liv. i. 22. dicentes being omitted. As Cicero, however, uses dicere to express such observations, and as the formal phraseology occurs in later writers, particularly in Suetonius, it may, without scruple, be adopted.

EXERCISE.

The Greeks, after the victory, determined to sail to the Hellespont, and to demolish the bridge, that the king might not escape. Themistocles dissuaded them from this, saying, that the king, being intercepted, would renew the battle; and that despair sometimes achieves what courage cannot. At the same time, he sent a eunuch to the king, acquainting him, that, if he did not escape quickly, the bridge would be demolished. Darius, therefore, fled; and Themistocles thus preserved the victory to the Athenians.

OBSERVATIONS.

Interrogatives, when preceded by such words as scio, nescio, quero, dubito, are said to be taken indefinitely, and are joined to the subjunctive mood.—Thus, Quid dixisti? “What did you say?” Nescio, quid dixerim, “I know not, what I said.” Ubinam es? “Where are you?” Ubinam sim, intelligo. “I understand, where I am.”

TRANQUILLUS.

QUIETUS.

Tranquillus, “calm,” “smooth,” “unruffled.” “It is,” says Dumesnil, “properly applied to the sea; and is generally used, when we speak of things.” Quietus, “peaceable,” is applied to persons and things. This distinction of Dumesnil’s is accurate as far as it goes; but it is not sufficiently extensive. Tranquillus he has correctly and fully explained as denoting “smooth,” “calm,” “undisturbed”—and as applied to things; thus, “Mare tranquillum.” Cic. pro Cluent. “Nox tranquilla.” Plin. ix. 27. “Locus tranquillus.” Plaut. Ep. iii. 4. 8. His explanation of quietus is defective. It agrees with tranquillus in denoting “quiet,” “calm,” “undisturbed;” but differs from it in this, that it denotes also “quiet,” or “still,” free from that restlessness, uneasiness, or “desire of change,” which stimulates to motion or action.—Tranquillus has a meaning purely passive, denoting that the subject is not disturbed—not acted upon. Quietus implies also, that it is not inclined to act. Hence, while the former is applied to things, the latter is applied to persons also. “Epaminondas domi quietus fuit.” Nepos in Pelop. “He remained quiet at home.” “He took no concern in the commotions of the state."—"Studio partium," says Faber, "et civili tumultu abstinuit." Tranquillus would denote, that he was tranquil, or not disturbed; but would not imply that "he was not inclined to act."

—“ Inprimis regina quietum Accipit in Teucros animum, mentemque benignam.”
Virg. Aen. i. 307.

This expression denotes that the mind of the queen was peaceably disposed towards the Trojans, "not inclined to resist or molest them."—The English word peaceable has, in like manner, an active or passive signification.

Again, it has been observed by some critics, that quietus is applied to the body only; and tranquillus to the mind.—This, as Doletus observes, is a distinction at once ridiculous, and false. Animi quies, and animus quietus, are expressions sanctioned by the best authority. But it is true, and deserves attention, as constituting another distinction between quietus and tranquillus, that the latter is never applied to the body, whereas the former is applicable both to body and mind. This distinction, indeed, might be inferred from the primary meaning of the two words, the latter implying "calm," "unruffled," like a smooth sea; the former "enjoying a cessation from labour and trouble."—A metaphorical application of the latter to the "body" would, therefore, be an absurdity.—“Tranquillo animo et quieto frui.”

Cic. pro Sylla.—“Vita tranquilla, quieta, et beata.”
Cic. de Fin. lib. i.

QUIS.

When quis is taken interrogatively, quid is more frequently used than quod; and when taken indefinitely, quod is very rarely employed. Perspicuity is consulted by an attention to this usage.

EXERCISE.

A certain youth had, for a long time, frequented the school of Zeno, the philosopher. When he returned home, his father asked him what he had learned. The son modestly answered, that he would shew him that by his conduct. The father was grievously offended, and beat him. The son remained perfectly composed, and said: “I have learned to bear a father’s anger with patience.”

OBSERVATIONS.

ITEM.

ITIDEM.

ADEO.

These words agree in denoting similarity. Item means “so,” “also,” or “in like manner,” but not precisely, in reference to what has been done, or said; itidem “exactly in the same way.” Sicut “in such manner, in relation to what follows;” adeo, “so far alike” in reference either to past or future, and pointing to the effect. Quoque and etiam “also” denote “in addition,” with no regard to parity or resemblance; “therewith.”

The adverb ubi, “ where,” means “ at,” or “ in what place.” Hence the prepositions at, or in, before the name of a town, are signs of the question’s being made by ubi; and in such examples the name of the town is put in the genitive, unless it be of the third declension, or plural number, in which case it is expressed in the ablative. It is to be observed, however, that the prepositions at, or in, are not always signs of the question ubi, or of motion, or rest in the place ; and that the idiom of the English, and that of the Latin language do not, in this respect, precisely agree. Thus, we say, “ Phaethon fell into the Po in Italy.” The Latins, more correctly perhaps, said, “ Phaethon fell into Italy, into the Po.” Phaethon præ timore in Padum in Italianam cecidit. “ Cicero sent his son to a school at Athens.” Athenas ad scholam filium misit. “ He sent his son to Athens to school.”

A similar difference of phraseology obtains, when motion from a place is signified. Thus, “ He removed from his farm at Capua into the island of Sardinia.” Capuā ex agello in Sardiniam migravit. That is, “ He removed from Capua.” The expression in English would lead the junior scholar to render it Capuæ, or ad Capuam, which latter phraseology could only be admitted, when the circumstance is expressed by a distinct clause, as quem ad Capuam habebat.

The adjectives, primus, medius, ultimus, summus, imus, interior, intimus, extremus, frequently denote, not the relative situation of the subject to which they refer, as either first, middle, last, &c.; but the first, middle, or last, part of the subject itself—thus Medius mons, means generally, “the middle part of the hill.” Imus mons, “the bottom of the hill.” Interior insula, “the inner part of the island.” Summa rupes, “the top,” or “highest part of the rock.”

Amorem contrahere, for “to contract an attachment,” occurs in modern Latin: of its accuracy some doubt may be justly entertained. Where the subject of the verb is the object of the affection, the expression is correct. We may say, sibi invidiam, odium, benevolentiam, &c. contraxit. Or where the affection, feeling, or habit is mutual, as consuetudinem, familiaritatem, contrahere. But, where the subject of the verb is not the object of the affection, or there is no mutual attraction, we question the correctness of the expression.

Inclamare est elata voce vocare.

EXERCISE.

In the reign of Augustus, a dolphin, it is said, contracted an attachment to the son of a poor man, who used to feed him with bits of bread. Every day the dolphin, when called by the boy, swam to the surface of the water; and, after being fed from his hand, carried the boy on his back from the shore at Baiæ to a school at Puteoli, and brought him back in the same manner. The boy having died, the dolphin coming several times to the usual place, and missing him, is said to have also died of grief.

OBSERVATIONS.

PRETER-IMPERFECT SUBJUNCTIVE.

In clauses introduced by if, or as if, implying a negation of the proposition expressed, present time, in English, is denoted in the conditional clause by the preterite tense, and past time by the pluperfect. When I say, “If I have the book, I will send it,” the meaning is clearly dubitative; and the expression implies, that I am uncertain, whether I have it, or have it not. When I say, “If I had the book, I would send it,” the meaning is, that I have it not; and the conditional clause, here equivalent to a negation, is expressed in the preterite tense, though the same time be implied, as in the preceding sentence. If past time is to be denoted, I say, “If I had had the book, I would have sent it.” Here the pluperfect is employed.

Thus also with “as if”—“He fights, as if he contended,” or “were contending for his life.” Present time is signified, and the two actions are evidently contemporary; yet the former verb is in the present, and the latter in the preterite tense. “He fought, as if he had contended,” or “had been contending for his life.” Here also the two actions are contemporaneous, and past time is implied; yet the former verb is in the preterite tense, and the latter in the pluperfect. This is not the case in Latin. The first of the two sentences would be rendered thus, Pugnat, quasi pro vita contendat. The actions, being contemporaneous, are each expressed in the same tense, and time present being meant, the verbs are put in the present tense. The second sentence would be thus rendered, Pugnavit, quasi contenderet. Here also the actions are represented as contemporaneous and past, and the verbs are each in the preterite tense. The English idiom would suggest the use of the pluperfect in the latter clause. “Quasi fundum vendam, meis me addicam legibus.” Plaut. Cap. i. 2. 78. “As if I sold.”—“Ædes confulgebant, quasi essent aureæ.” Plaut. Amph. v. 1. 44. “The house shone, as if it had been of gold.” In Latin, the two circumstances, with a strict attention to the nature of the proposition, are expressed as co-existent, or contemporary. In English, the one is expressed, as if prior to the other.

When the actions are not contemporary, the prior is expressed in the preterite tense, if the other be expressed in the present; and, if both actions be past, the subsequent action is expressed in the preterite, and the one preceding it, in the pluperfect. “Jam nunc times, quasi nunquam adfueris, nunquam tute pepereris.” Ter. Ad. iii. 1. 3. “As if you had never been present, as if you yourself had never born a child.” The circumstances here are not supposed to be contemporary, the “being present,” and “the bearing,” being prior to “the fearing.” Nor, in the following sentence are the actions contemporary; “Medico (dedisti) tria milla jugerum, quasi te sanasset; rhetori duo, quasi disertum facere potuisset." Cic. Phil. 2. ad fin. This mode of expression is very generally observed by good writers. It recommends itself, in truth, by its subserviency to perspicuity. Aurelius Victor, from whom the following Exercise is taken, employs the pluperfect after *quasi, the two circumstances being considered as contemporary, and the preceding verb being in the pluperfect tense. But, even in such cases as this, the preterimperfect tense is far preferable, as more conducive to perspicuity, and far more common. For quasi accepisset might imply, that "the receiving" was prior to "the sitting;" instead of being contemporary with it †.

* Schottus reads acciperet.

† The pluperfect tense, whether used indicatively or sub-junctively, cannot be employed, consistently with its true and proper character, unless to express an action or event perfected, antecedently to another event, also perfected. The distinction is clearly marked, in English, by have and had. "I have taught," or "I taught," and "I had taught," are expressions which precisely note the relation between a preterperfect and a preterpluperfect action. When a learned reviewer, therefore, proposes the following sentence as correct, "Plataenses ad paludem olim habitasse, noster affirmat; in locum autem meliorem translatos novae urbi nomen priscum continuasse, situi licet ab aquis remoto haud diutius competisset," (Ed. Rev. No. 28.) he connects tenses, which are incongruous—tenses, which, neither consistently with their own essential character, nor with the usage of good writers, can possibly harmonise. The reader will observe, that the verb affirmat is in the present tense—that the verb continuasse, referring to affirmat, and expressing its subject, is in the preterite, and not the preterpluperfect tense ("continued," not

The verb Credo is thus construed. The person to whom credit is given, or who is believed as speaking, is put in the dative: as Credo tibi, “I believe you.” The thing believed, or the object of belief, is put in the accusative, as Credo hanc rem, “I believe this thing.” An article of faith is by modern writers expressed with in; as Credo in Deum, “I believe in God,” that is, “in the existence of God.”—Credo in “had continued,”) and that the “unsuitableness,” though it, doubtless, existed antecedently to the continuation, is to be here predicated, as contemporaneous with it, and yet not preventing the “continuation.” This is evidently the fact to be expressed; and yet the author has represented a prior “unsuitableness,” and which, according to his expression, had ceased to exist, as a circumstance which might, though it did not, influence the “continuation.” The tense, as the Oxford critic gives it, should be the preterimperfect subjunctive. Nothing could justify competisset, but affirmavit, instead of affimat. Then continuasse would be preterpluperfect; and there are not wanting examples, which, in this case, would sanction competisset, though even then competeret would be more agreeable to general usage. An error of a similar kind is involved in his defence of the expression. He says, “In an oblique narration, or statement, in the person of one who had long ceased to exist, events co-existent with him are to be expressed in the imperfect; and those preceding him in the pluperfect tense subjunctive.” It should evidently be, “Who has long ceased.” To justify “had,” congruity of tense would require “were to be expressed,” which would, contrary to the intention of the writer, convert a general proposition into a particular fact. The principle of this defence, it is apprehended, is erroneous, the subordinate tenses being dependent on that of the principal verb: but were the rule admitted to be, in every respect, correct, it would not justify the expression of the reviewer.

immortalitatem animi, “ I believe in the immortality of the soul.” But such phraseology is unclassical, and totally unworthy of imitation.—Credo esse Deum—Credo animum esse immortalem, are the classical expressions.

It deserves the attention of the junior reader, that the person, who is believed as speaking, cannot be made the nominative to the verb in the passive voice, because put in the dative after the active verb; but the person believed, as spoken of, may become the nominative to the passive verb. Thus, “ I (as speaking) am believed,” must not be rendered Ego credor, but Mihi creditur. The former expression would imply, that ego is the subject of opinion or belief, not the person, to whom credit is given. Thus, Ille creditur dixisse, “ He is believed to have said.”—“ Fortunam matris—ut serva natus crederetur, fecisse.” Liv. i. 39.

The reader has been already informed, how he ought to render at, or in, before the name of a town, the question being made by ubi; but he must observe, that, when at means, not in, but near, it must be rendered by ad.—Thus, Londini means “ at,” or “ in London.” Ad Londinum, “ at,” or “ near London.”

Before, when it precedes a verb, is rendered by antequam, priusquam; but when it is followed by a noun singly, or a noun with an adjective or participle, it is rendered by ante. Thus, “ before the city was built.”—Antequam, or Priusquam urbs condita est—or Ante urbem conditam. The same observation is applicable to post and postquam, thus, “after he came.” Postquam venit, or Post adventum—Post advenit would mean, “He came afterwards,” post being here an adverb, and synonymous with postea. “After the kings were banished,” Post reges exactos, or *Postquam exacti sunt reges.

* There are two ambiguities in English, occasioned by the improper use of the words after and after that, against which we take this opportunity of guarding the junior reader. We frequently meet with such expressions as, “A few days after he arrived,” “A few weeks after he died.” These expressions are ambiguous. They may signify either, that he arrived, or that he died, a few days or weeks after some time or event previously mentioned; or that some event took place, a few days or weeks after his arrival, or after his death. If the former meaning be intended, it is usual to make the distinction by a comma, separating after from the subsequent clause. This is a very insufficient provision against misconception; the meaning should not be left to depend on punctuation. If the former of the two senses be intended, the substitution of afterwards for after precludes the ambiguity.

It was common, as we find in several old translations, to render such expressions as Postquam abiit, “After that he departed.” And we occasionally still meet with a similar ambiguity; the meaning being allowed to depend on a comma. The English expression may, according to the punctuation, be rendered either by Postquam abiit, or Postea abiit; and in reading, its meaning could be determined only by laying, or omitting, the emphasis on the word that.—If his departure was subsequent to some circumstance previously mentioned, the word that may be retained, or, with more precision, the word afterwards substituted. “Afterwards he departed,” Postea abiit. But if the meaning be the reverse of this, and if it be intended to signify that his departure was antecedent to some circumstance afterwards related, the word that should be omitted. “After he departed,” Postquam abiit. The same observations are applicable to before, and before that. And

EXERCISE.

Publius Scipio, surnamed Africanus from the conquest of Africa, is believed to have been the son of Jupiter. For, before he was conceived, a serpent of huge size appeared in his mother's bed; and, when he was an infant, a snake, having twisted itself round him, did not do him any harm. He never undertook any expedition, till he had sitten for some time in the chair of Jupiter, as if he had been receiving divine counsel. When he was eighteen years of age, he saved the life of his father at Ticinum; and, when he was twenty-four years old, he was sent to Spain in the capacity of praetor, and took Carthage, on the very day, on which he arrived.

OBSERVATIONS.

REPETUNDÆ.

Repetundæ, sciz. pecuniae, denotes “extortion.” —“Clames, te lege repetundarum pecuniarum non in reference to this adverb, we may be excused, if we remark in passing, a mode of expression, which sometimes occurs even in reputable English writers, but more frequently in colloquial language, and which seems objectionable, if not absolutely absurd. Thus we hear it said, “He died before he signed his will,” “He fell a sacrifice to his valour, before he beheld the fruits of his victory.” When two events, or two actions, not simultaneous, are stated, we may properly say, that the one has taken place, or will take place, before the other, it being clearly understood, that each will be, or has been. Thus, “He decamped, before the enemy arrived.” Here are two events, each perfected, a prior and a posterior. But in the former mode of expression an event is signified, as antecedent to a past event, which event never happened. A relation of antecedence and sequence is indicated, where there was no consequent. We should say, “he died without signing,” or “not having signed his will.”

teneri." Cic. pro Client. It is thus defined by a learned critic, " Repetundæ fuerunt, quas sive socii, sive cives privati, a magistratibus, aut publicis curatoribus judicio repetiverunt, quas illi aut in provincia, aut in urbe, aut ob jus dicendum, aut ob judicandum, aut ob aliud aliquid publice curandum, cepissent." Pitisc. Lex. Ant. Rom. In the latter ages of the Roman state, this crime was punished by exile.

ABSOLUTE CASE*.

The junior reader may require to be informed, that, in English, the absolute case is the nominative,

* Absolute is opposed to relative. An absolute mode in logic is that, which belongs to its subject, without any reference to any other being; and a case is called absolute, which has no syntactical relation to any other word in the sentence. The term, therefore, though confined to an independent substantive with a participle, is, in truth, applicable to any noun or verb having no grammatical connection with any other part of the sentence, and under the government of a word not expressed, but understood. For it is to be carefully observed, that though the word be, in one respect, absolute and independent, because it bears no syntactical relation to any other word in the sentence, it is not, therefore, to be inferred that the word is under no government whatever. Thus, when we say, Die quarto domum rediit, die is governed by in understood. Multo labore peregit, that is, cum labore. So likewise in respect to the ablative absolute. It is, in fact, governed by some preposition understood, as ab, in, sub; and, in some cases, we find the preposition expressed. Sanetius, therefore, objects to the term absolute, as inapplicable.

Mr. Jones, in his Latin Grammar, reduces the ablative absolute under the general rule, by which the cause is expressed in the ablative. "Grammarians," he observes, "call this form the and in Latin the ablative. Thus, “ the Romans being conquered by the Carthaginians, Hannibal marched absolute case—a term which conveys no meaning, or an erroneous meaning ; for, so far from being absolute or independent of the rest of the sentence, the clause is so connected with what goes before, or what comes after, as a cause is with its effect. And the reason why it is put in the ablative is, that the ablative is the case, which expresses the cause or medium, by which an effect is produced.” Jones's Latin Grammar.

When the term absolute or independent is applied to the ablative case, with a participle joined to it, the term is used, not in a logical, but a grammatical sense ; and the meaning is, not that the idea or sentiment has no relation to the context, but that the word has no syntactical connection, either by concord or government, with any other clause of the sentence. And it is of importance here to observe, that ideas may be logically connected, when their signs have no grammatical relation whatever. From a logical connection, therefore, a grammatical dependence or relation by no means follows as a necessary consequence. But let us inquire whether it be true, as the author assumes, that the idea itself is logically reducible under the notion of Cause. When Eutropius says, “ Quo (Ser. Tullio) regnante, Balthasar imperabat Chaldæis,” are we to understand, that the Quo regnante was either directly or indirectly the cause of the fact stated in the succeeding member of the sentence ? Are we to understand, that Belshazzar reigned at Babylon, because Servius reigned at Rome ? or when Livy says, “ Anco regnante, Lucumo Romam commigravit,” is it to be understood, that the reign of Ancus was, in any sense whatever, the cause of Lucumo’s removal, or the medium by which it was effected ? Or, if we say, “ Cicero hæc verba faciente, Catilina curiam ingressus est,” are we conceived to signify, that Cicero’s words were the cause of Catiline’s entrance ? When Livy says, “ Direptis bonis regum, damnati sunt proditores,” ii. 5, does he mean to inform us, that the plunder of the king’s property was the cause of the traitor’s to Capua." In English, the Romans joined to the participle being is in the nominative case; but in Latin would be put in the ablative: and the noun being syntactically independent on any word in the condemnation? I candidly own myself totally ignorant, what is the relation between cause and effect, if any such idea is conveyed in any of the passages, which have been now adduced. In the three first is expressed the contemporaneity of two events, and in the last the priority of one event to another; but no other relation whatever is predicated. The resolution of the ablative with its participle, by cum, dum, and postquam, appears incontrovertibly to evince, that its general office cannot possibly be to express the cause, though this may occasionally and inferentially be denoted by it. When it is resolved by dum, the noun is under the government of in understood, and the expression denotes the relation of contemporaneity. As Eo ita loquente, frater ingressus est, that is, In co. When it is resolvable by Postquam, the noun is governed by a or ab understood, and the expression denotes the relation of priority, as "After he had taken the city, he returned home." Urbe capta domum rediit, that is, Ab urbe capta, equivalent to Post urbem captam, ab frequently having the meaning of post. And, when the participle existente is supposed to be understood, the ablative is under the government of sub understood, thus, Cæsare duce, that is, Sub Cæsare duce. The preposition is sometimes expressed, as, "Nullò sub teste canebat." (Juv. Sat. xv. 26.)

Milton has used, sometimes the nominative, and sometimes, it would seem, the objective case, as absolute; and Bentley, while he has once corrected him when wrong, has repeatedly censured him when right.

" God from the mount of Sinai, whose gray top Shall tremble, He descending." P. L. xii. 227.

Bentley would erroneously substitute Him, with nothing to govern it, either expressed, or understood.

sentence, the Latin case, in which it is put, is called, therefore, the ablative absolute. But, though an independent substantive, joined to a participle, be generally thus rendered in Latin, it is sometimes, with peculiar elegance and precision, put under the government of the verb in the succeeding clause. Thus, “Having taken Regulus prisoner, they sent him to Carthage,” Regulum captum Carthaginem miserunt. Here Regulum is the regimen of miserunt. There are not wanting examples to justify another phraseology, namely, Regulo capto, eum Carthaginem miserunt. The latter form of expression, however, is much less precise; for it does not so clearly signify, that the person taken, was also the person sent. The pronoun eum might refer to some other person. “Comprehensos Volscos Romam duxere.” Liv. ii. 22.—“Having seized the Volsci, they carried them to Rome.” Here there is much more precision of expression, than if he had said, Volscis comprehensis, eos Romam duxere.

The following expression of Livy is peculiarly precise and elegant. “Puero dormienti, cui Servio Tullio nomen fuit, caput arsisse ferunt.” Liv. i. 39. If he had said, “Puero dormiente,—ejus caput arsisse ferunt,” it would not have been clearly denoted, that puero and ejus both referred to the same person. If he had said, pueri dormientis, it would have less directly conveyed the idea, that the singular circumstance happened to the boy.

EXERCISE.

A young lady of very great beauty, whom he had taken captive in the war, he forbade to be brought into his presence ; and ordered her to be restored to her father and her lover. Having defeated Hasdrubal and Mago, the brothers of Hannibal, he drove them out of Italy, and formed an alliance with Syphax, king of the Mauritanians. Having returned home victorious, he was elected consul before he was of the legal age ; and, being sent into Africa, he conquered Hannibal, who had been compelled to return to Carthage, for the defence of his country. Being falsely accused of extortion by Petillius, the tribune, he went into voluntary exile, where he spent the remainder of his days.

OBSERVATIONS.

It has been already observed, that every purpose, intention, or effect, is expressed by ut. It may now be observed, that the purpose is frequently expressed by ad, as “Ad sedandos motus.” Liv. iii. 50. “For the purpose of quelling the mutiny.”

The following phraseologies deserve attention. “He sent ambassadors to sue for peace.” Misit legatos, petere pacem (male). Pacem petendi causa (mediocriter). Ad pacem petendum (melius).—Pacem petitum (bene). Pacis petendæ causa (admodum bene). Ad pacem petendam. Qui pacem peterent (eleganter).

The infinitive mood frequently supplies the place of a nominative to a verb in the indicative, or subjunctive mood, and also of an accusative before an infinitive mood; thus, “It is easy to complain.” Facile est queri.—Here queri is the nominative to est—“to complain is easy, or an easy thing.”—“We know, that it is easy to complain.” Scimus, facile esse queri—or, “that to complain is easy.”—Here queri supplies the place of an accusative before esse.

In the following Exercise the same idiomatical expression occurs, “as if he had been carrying on,” which has been already explained. (See p. 52.)

In metaphysical strictness, no words expressive of nihility, admit any intensive word, or any word implying degrees to be joined to them, for nothing cannot be made either greater, or less. The Latins, however, in order to render the expression stronger, occasionally deviated from this rule. Thus, “Usque adeo nihil est?” Juv. iii. 84. “Is it of so little value?” Our phraseology is the more correct; theirs the more forcible. We know, how insignificant he is, Scimus, quam nullus sit.

EXERCISE.

Xerxes, before the naval engagement, in which he was defeated by Themistocles, had sent four thousand armed men to Delphi, to plunder the temple of Apollo; just as if he had been carrying on war, not only with the Greeks, but also with the immortal Gods. This body of men was entirely destroyed by rain and thunder. Historians say, that this was done, in order that he might understand, how insignificant is the strength of men against the immortal Gods. The wicked forget, that to war against Heaven is to court their own destruction.

O B S E R V A T I O N S.

Cum—a Conjunction.

It has been already observed, that Mr. Ruddiman has, in one instance, confounded the subjunctive with the potential mood. Various other examples might be produced, in which he, and, indeed, most of our grammarians, have committed the same error.

It has been observed also, that this mood has two different names, as it has two distinct uses, potential and subjunctive. When the meaning is contingent, that is, when the sense requires this form, the mood is then strictly potential, as, Doceam, “I may teach.” Here the verb is not affected, as to its mood, by any antecedent word. But if we say, Quod doceam, “Because I teach,” the verb is under the government of the conjunction quod, and were it not for this conjunction, the English being indicative, the verb would be put in the indicative mood. In this example, therefore, the verb is strictly in the subjunctive mood, this form being used, not because the sense requires it, for the English is indicative, but because it is subjoined to the conjunction quod.

A strict attention to this distinction is indispensably necessary in all questions, that regard the modal government of adverbs and conjunctions; for thus only can it be rightly understood, whether the mood be employed, as being under the government of some preceding particle, or whether the import of the clause require that mood. In the two following sentences, for example, it might be, and, indeed, has been supposed, by no contemptible critic, that the verb in each is in the subjunctive mood, and under the government of cum, whereas it is the sense, and not the adverb, by which the mood of the verb is determined, which is here, therefore, properly called potential. “Versabatur mihi tempus illud ante oculos, cum ille aut lictores dimitteret, aut vi avelleretur ex complexu meo.” Cic. ad Att. iii. 9.—The meaning of the clause is, “When he would either dismiss the lictors, or would be torn.”—“Hunc videre sæpe optabamus diem, cum ex te esset aliquis, qui te appellaret patrem.” Ter. Hec. iv. 4, 30.—“When there should be some one.” In neither of these sentences is the mood of the verb affected by the preceding particle. The distinction here suggested, I would the more earnestly recommend to the attention of the reader, as few, if any, of our grammarians seem to have perceived it. Ruddiman, whose accuracy is pre-eminent in every question which he discusses, appears, in this instance, not to have exercised his usual sagacity.

Having premised these observations, I proceed to consider when Cum ought to be joined to the indicative, and when to the subjunctive mood. Concerning its regimen, as a conjunction, grammarians are pretty nearly agreed.

Cum taken for quoniam, or quandoquidem, “since,” is very generally joined to the subjunctive mood.—“Cum Athenas sis profectus.” Cic. “As, or since, you are gone to Athens.”—“Cum amet aliam, non est utile hanc illi dari." Ter. Ad. iii. 2, 43. "Cum autem duobus modis, id est, aut vi aut fraude, fiat injuria." Cic. de Off. i. 13. "Quod cum ita sit." Cic. Off. lib. iii. 3. It is sometimes, though rarely, in this sense joined with the indicative, "Quandoquidem ipse est ingenio bono, cumque huic veritus est opportumæ adolescenti facere injuriam." Ter. And. iii. 2, 7. Linacer errs, when he asserts, that cum for quoniam is always joined with the subjunctive mood.

Cum taken for quod, "because,"* generally takes the indicative mood. "Ego redigam vos in gratiam hoc fretus, cum e medio excessit." Ter. Phor. v. 7, 77. Trusting to this circumstance, "that," or "because." "Diis gratias ago, cum tantum literæ meæ potuerunt." Cic. Fam. Ep. xiii. 24.

Cum taken for etsi "although," is, I believe, uniformly joined with the subjunctive mood. "Cui cum Cato et Caninius intercessissent, tamen est perscripta." Cic. Ep. i. 2. "Itaque in vestitu, cum dissimillima sit virilis toga tunicae muliebri, stola pallio, tamen inæqualitatem hanc sequitur nihilominus." Varro de ling. Lat. lib. ix. In the following sentence it is used absolutely. "Nec enim ullum hoc

* Since and because may, in many cases, be used indiscriminately, without injury to the sense; but they are not words of precisely the same import. "Will you not go, because I have commanded you?" and "Will you not go, since I have commanded you?" (Bible) are by no means equivalent expressions. The former means, "Is my commanding it, your reason for not going?" The latter, "Is not my commanding it a sufficient argument for your going?"

frigidius flumen attigi, cum ad multa accesserim."

Cic. de Leg. lib. ii.

When I express my belief, that cum, taken for etsi, is uniformly joined with the subjunctive mood, I am aware, that examples occur in some editions of the Classics, in which it is found joined to the indicative mood. The genuineness, however, of those readings, by which the conjunction is thus construed, may be justly suspected; and, by several critics of acknowledged erudition, the subjunctive form has been preferred.

Cum—an Adverb.

Cum, taken as an adverb, says Mr. Ruddiman, is sometimes joined to the indicative, but most commonly with the subjunctive mood. If this rule imply, that cum may be construed with the indicative or subjunctive mood indifferently, the rule, if not chargeable with error, justifies a usage inconsistent with the best established phraseology; for cum, as an adverb, is in certain cases, by good writers, uniformly joined with the indicative mood. If the rule import, that in some instances it ought to be joined with the indicative, and in others with the subjunctive mood, the rule is correct, but it wants precision. The scholar should be informed, in what cases it should be construed with the one, and not the other, and in what cases with either.

Mr. Ruddiman seems also, in two of his examples, to have mistaken the indicative for the subjunctive mood. “Cum faciam vitula, pro frugibus, ipse veni- to." Virg. Ecl. iii. Faciam he considers here to be under the government of cum, and in the subjunctive mood; to me it appears rather to be the future of the indicative; and for these reasons: 1st. The event is clearly future; "When I shall sacrifice, or be sacrificing." It may be translated, indeed, "When I am sacrificing"; but this idiom, by which we express a future event by the present tense, though common in English, occurs very rarely in Latin, and chiefly in dramatic writers. Thus, "When I am gone," is expressed in Latin by the future perfect, Ubi ego abiero. "When he is come," Cum ille venerit. "When I teach, you shall learn," Cum ego docebo, tu disces. An inattention to this difference of idiom occasions such inaccuracies as the following: "Cum moriuntur, habitabunt cum Deo." Here a future event is improperly expressed in the present tense, connected as it is with another future event. Had the sentiment been given as a general proposition, the present would have been admissible: but the following verb must have been in the same tense.

2dly. It is in such examples, as the passage in question, that the adverb cum is, I believe, uniformly joined with the indicative mood. This shall be afterwards shewn by a variety of examples. And I am inclined to think, that, had Virgil intended to express the act of sacrificing in the present tense, he would not have deviated from common usage, by joining cum, in the sense in which it is here used, with the subjunctive mood. I conceive; therefore, that faciam is in the future tense indicative, and that the example is similar to the following : “ Cum tu horum nihil refelles, vincam scilicet.” Ter. Ph. i. 2. 81. “ When you disprove, or shall disprove, none of these things.”

In the other example, and also in one quoted from Rhenius, he mistakes an indicative for a subjunctive tense. “ Carmina tum mollius, cum venerit ipse, canemus.” Virg. Ecl. ix. “ Vereor ne exeundi potestas non sit, cum Cæsar venerit.” Cic.—Both these are adduced as examples of cum joined with the subjunctive mood. Now it appears to me demonstrable, that the Latins have no future subjunctive, and that its place is, in all cases, supplied by the future participle, and the verb sum. The tense, which is commonly called the future subjunctive, belongs, strictly, to the indicative mood. Its signification is purely assertive. No contingency, no conditionality, is denoted by it. Not a single example can be produced, in which this tense occurs as subjunctive. In the passages now quoted, perfect action is clearly implied; and venero would be used to denote a future action completed, whether cum, or any other particle, had, or had not, preceded it. When Geta says, “ Ubi ego hinc abiero,” Ter. Ph. i. 2. 93., will it be said, that abiero is in the subjunctive mood, and under the government of ubi? This surely will not be affirmed ; for not one example can be produced in which ubi, unless taken indefinitely, or where there is an ellipsis, is joined to the subjunctive mood.—Venerit, therefore, is not under the government of cum; it is the sense, and not the particle, which requires the tense in question, which, as has been just now remarked, belongs to the indicative mood, and has been very properly characterized by the name of Futurum Exactum, or, “Future Perfect.” It bears the same relation to the future indicative, as the preterpluperfect does to the preterimperfect, and as the préterite, definitely considered, bears to the present. According to this view of the subject, the tenses harmonize one with another, and the closest analogy is observable among them. Thus we have, “I read,” or “am reading,” and “I have read,” Lego—Legi; “I was reading,” and “I had read,” Legebam—Legeram; “I shall be reading,” and “I shall have read,” Legam—Legero. The latter of each pair implies the perfection of the action, and has the same positive and assertive meaning as the former. The proper character, therefore, of this tense, in respect to affirmation, is indicative; in respect to time, future; and in regard to action, perfect. Its distinctive name, therefore, is the future perfect indicative.

Rhenius, Ursinus, and Schmidius, give the three following rules for the government of cum.

1st. Cum, for “When,” in an absolute sense, takes the present indicative, the future indicative, and the future subjunctive. Had these learned critics perceived, that the future subjunctive is, in fact, an indicative tense, they would have rendered their rule more simple, and more consistent with propriety. For to give as a rule, that cum, taken absolutely, is joined with the indicative, and also with the subjunctive, in one and the same sense, though it specifies the tenses of each, is but little calculated to promote precision of idea, or to establish a clear and consistent principle. The fact, however, which these learned critics state, furnishes a strong presumption, that what is commonly called the future subjunctive is, in truth, an indicative tense.

2dly. That when the adverb cum answers to the German words als, or da, “as,” “when,” or “while,” it governs the subjunctive mood.

3dly. If any mention be made of any time generally or specially, it admits any tense of the indicative mood.

The two last rules are correct; but the first is not sufficiently comprehensive: for cum, taken absolutely, admits also the imperfect indicative, as “Cum aliquid videbatur caveri posse, tum id negligentiam dolebam.” Cic. Ep. Fam. lib. xxii. And likewise the preterite, as “Cum vero prope ad manus ventum est, tum jam a propinquuo hostis et impetus propulsandus, et clamore terrendus est.” A. Gell. i. 11. “Cum patriam amisi, tum me periisse putato.” Ov. Trist. iii. 3. It is to be observed also, that these rules, taken as a whole, are defective, cum being often joined to the indicative mood, when the sense is not absolute, and when no time is mentioned, either specially or generally. Of cum taken for postquam the learned critics are silent.

Noltenius more comprehensively gives the following rules : “ Cum (he observes), for quando, quo tempore, quoties, takes the present, the preterite, and the future indicative ; for postquam, and ex quo the present and preterite of the same mood, or the imperfect and pluperfect subjunctive, rarely the same tenses indicative ; and when any time is noted, either specially or generally, it takes the indicative mood.”

For the direction of the junior reader in the adverbial use of cum, we subjoin the following observations :

1st. Cum is joined to the indicative mood, when it is taken for quoties, or quandocunque, “ as often as,” or “ whenever.”—“ Cum prospero ejus flatu utimur, ad exitus pervehimur optatos, et cum reflavit, affligimur.” Cic. Off. ii. 6. “ Quotidianis præliis cum Germanis contendunt, cum aut suis finibus eos prohibent, aut ipsi in corum finibus bellum gerunt.” Cæs. B. G. i. 1. “ Cum audio ad te ire aliquem, literas ad te dare soleo.” Cic. “ Cum amatore suo cum cœnant, liguriunt.” Ter. Eun. iv. 4, 14. “ Sed cum erit utendum principio, quod plerumque erit, aut ex reo, aut ex adversario, aut ex re, aut ex eis, apud quos agetur, sententias duci decebit.” Cic. de Orat.

2dly. Cum taken for quando, denoting “ at the time, when,” or “ at which time,” is joined to the indicative mood. “ Ne stridorem quidem serræ tunc audiunt, cum acuitur ; aut grunnitum cum jugulatur sus.” Cic. Tusc. Quæst. lib. v.—“ Nam quid est ineptius, quam de dicendo dicere, cum id ipsum dicere nunquam sit non ineptum, nisi cum est necessarium ?”

Cic. de Orat. lib. i. In the last example the word occurs both as a conjunction, signifying "since," and also as an adverb. "Alium alio modo excitare, cum Metellus conspicitur." Sall. B. J. cap. 53. "Muro circumdare oppidum parabat, cum Sabinum bellum cœptis intervenit." Liv. i. 36.—"Dies haud multi intercesserant, cum oppidanī concurrunt." Sall. B. J. cap. 64.

"Sollicitudo remanebit, cum intelligetis." Sall. B. J. cap. 53. "Veniet tempus, cum graviter gemes." Cic. ad Att. ii. 19. "Si valebis, cum recte navigari poterit." Cic.

The poets also observe the same rule, joining cum to the indicative, when it denotes either "whenever," "as often as," "at the time, when," or "at which time."

- "Non ego, cum scribo, si forte quid aptius exit,
"Laudari metuam." Pers. i. 45.
- "Tunc illa time, cum pocula sumes." Juv. x. 26.
- "Partibus æquabat justis, aut sorte trahebat,
"Cum subito Æneas concursu accedere magno
"Anthæa Sergestumque videt." Virg. Æn. i. 512.

3dly. Cum is used when we express the point of time at which an action or state commenced, conceived to be continued to the present period. Hence it is joined with a present, or with a preterite tense definite—and is nearly synonymous with ex quo tempore "ago that," or "since," as dating the commencement of the action or state. When a cardinal numeral is used, it is necessary, in order to reconcile the Latin with the English idiom in some cases, either to render cum by “during which time,” or to convert the Latin negative into a positive term.

“Quia septem menses sunt, cum in hasce ædes pedem nemo intro tetulit.” Plaut. Most. ii. 2, 39. “It is seven months since any one entered this house,” or “seven months during which time no one hath entered this house.”—“Jam anni prope quadraginta sunt, cum hoc probatur.” Cic. de Orat. “It is now nearly forty years since this has been proved,” or “during which time this has been, and still continues to be, proved.”—Vigesimus annus est, cum omnes scelerati in me unum petunt.” Cic. “It is now the twentieth year since all wicked men began, and still continue, to assail me.”—“Permulti anni erant, cum nulla certamina fuerunt.” Liv. “It was many years, since there had been any disputes,” or “There were many years, that (during which) there were no disputes.”

4thly. Cum, when it signifies “as soon as,” and is emphatically used with primum, denoting an action or event in close succession to another, is joined to the indicative mood. “Cum ad nos allatum est de temeritate eorum, graviter commotus sum.” Cic. Att. iv. 7. “As soon as we were informed.”—“Cum primum Romam veni.” Cic. “As soon as I came to Rome.”—“Cum primum eam agere cœpi.” Ter. Hec. Prol. 33.

5thly. Cum, taken for postquam, “after,” denot-ing simply the posteriority of one event to another, but not implying close succession, is joined to the subjunctive mood.—“Hæc eum animadvertisset, vehementer eos incusavit.” Cæs. B. G. i. 40. “Cum finem oppugnandi nox fecisset, nuncios ad eum misit.” Cæs. B. G. ii. 6. “Quod eum Aristides audisset, in concessionem venit.” Cic. Off. iii. 11.—“Cum consulaciem instruxisset—insequi fusos pedes noluit.” Liv. ii. 43.

6thly. Cum, when joined to a secondary clause, expressing a past action or event, as in progression, to which another action or event, in the primary clause, is expressed as contemporary, is joined with the subjunctive mood. In this sense it is nearly synonymous with *dum. “Cum civitas armis jus suum exequi

* Scheller, with his wonted accuracy, observes, that cum should not be confounded with dum. “Hoc (dum) semper indicat tempus adhuc durans per eam actionem, quæ in illo fit,” e. g. Dum scribebam venit pater. “Hic dum indicat patrem venisse in media scriptione, ut ita loquar, at cum scribebam non accurate hoc indicat.” (Præcept. Stil. b. Lat.) The proper meaning of dum appears to be “during the time, in which;” and hence it has frequently the signification of “as long as.” Thus, Dum hominum genus erit. Cic. “During the time that the human race shall exist,” or “As long as the human race shall exist.” While dum implies a space of time, through which any action or state extends, cum refers to a point of time, at which any action, or state, is either beginning, proceeding, or finished. When it refers to an action, or state, proceeding, being connected with a tense implying progression, and therefore a space of time, it may often be rendered by “while,” and may be considered as nearly synonymous with dum.

conaretur, Orgetorix mortuus est." Cæs. B. G. cap. 5.
 "Cum haec maxime ageret, nuncii ab Tusculo veniunt." Liv. iii. 31. "Cum enim rex Pyrrhus, populo Romano ultiro bellum intulisset, cumque de imperio certamen esset, perfuga ab eo venit." Cic. Off. iii. 22.
 "In Cumano cum essem, venit ad me—Hortensius." Cic. Att. v. 11. "Pridie Nonas Jun. cum essem Brundusii, literas tuas accepi." Cic. Ep. Fam. iii. 4.

It would seem that the rule by which the practice of classic writers was generally regulated, in regard to the adverb cum, was to join it to the indicative mood, when they intended emphatically to mark the time of one action, present, past, or future, as coincident with that of another action, or with any time, specially or generally. If no particular stress was laid on the times as coincident, and if the actions themselves, not their co-existence, or their continuity, formed the primary consideration, cum was joined to the subjunctive mood. When Pythias says, "Neque cum rogites, quid sit, audet dicere," (Ter. Eun. iv. 3. 17.) she does not mean to mark the silence of Pamphila, as coincident, in time, with the inquiry; she means simply, "If you ask her," "on your asking her." When she says also, "Vide, amabo, si non, cum aspicias, os impudens videtur," (Eun. v. 1, 22.) cum aspicias does not mean "at the time you look at him," as if the fact were so, only when he was beheld, but merely, "Is he not in aspect an impudent fellow?" When Cicero says, "Cum Brutum nostrum convenissem, cumque tardius in Asiam venturum animadverterem, in Asiam redii," (Ep. Fam. xii. 14,) he does not intend to say, that immediately after his interview with Brutus, and at the time of his observing, that he would be late in coming into Asia, he himself returned, but merely, that, on having had an interview with Brutus, and on his observing, that he would not be soon prepared to march into Asia, he himself returned. "Cum ex captivis quæreret Cæsar, hanc reperiebat causam." Cæs. B. G. cap. 50, means simply, "on Cæsar's inquiring."—"Cum civitas—armis jus suum exequi conaretur, Orgetorix mortuus est." Cæs. B. G. cap. 4. When Cæsar uses this expression, he does not intend to fix the date of Orgetorix's death, as referable to the same period with the preparations of the people to enforce their authority, but to inform his reader of the two facts, without particularly marking their co-existence. The expression denotes simply "The state was endeavouring to assert its authority; and in the mean time Orgetorix died." If we say in English, "Orgetorix died at the time, at which the state was preparing to enforce its authority," and, "When the state was preparing—Orgetorix died,"—a little attention will convince the reader, that the expressions are by no means precisely equivalent. The obvious purpose of the former is to identify the time of Orgetorix's death, with the time of the preparations; in the latter, the two facts constitute the primary objects; their coincidence in time is but a secondary consideration. If we say, Orgetorix mortuus est, cum civitas conabatur, (See Liv.

xxxv. 2,) or Civitas conabatur, cum Orgetorix mortuus est, we emphatically denote the coincidence of the events ; but neither of these is the expression of Cæsar. When Cicero says, in his Fourth Epistle to Lentulus, “ A. D. XVI. Cal. Feb. cum in senatu pulcherrime staremus—res ab adversariis nostris extracta est,” he does not mean to fix the period of the question’s being put off, by saying, it happened when he stood well with the senate. Cum staremus is not intended to note the date of the postponement, but simply to state incidentally a coincident circumstance. If we substitute cum stabamus, we alter the meaning of the expression ; for this would refer his standing well with the senate to the preceding date, and signify, “ that on the 16th before the Calends of February, at which time he stood well with the senate, the affair was postponed.” Suppose, again, that we say, Pulcherrime stabamus, cum res extracta est, this would signify, “ on the 16th before the Calends of February, we stood well with the senate, when (at which time) the affair was postponed.”

Before we dismiss the subject, it is necessary to observe, that the rules delivered for joining cum with the indicative mood, do not take place in the two following cases : 1st. If the clause be oblique—We say, for example, “ Tempus fuit, cum homines vagabantur,” Cic. but, “ Scio tempus fuisse, cum homines vagarentur.”—“ Scis tempus fuisse,” says Cicero, “ cum homines existimarent.” Ep. Fam. x. 3. 2dly. When any thing doubtful, contingent, or fortuitous, is implied, the sense requires the potential mood. “Sed tu omnia consilia differebas in id tempus, cum sciremus.” Cic. Att. ii. 14., “when we should know.”—“Sed quando illum diem, cum tu edendam putas?” Cic. “When you will, or may, think, that it ought to be published.” It must be observed also, that though usage be very generally conformable to these rules, it is not universally so. Cicero says, “Tempus fuit, cum homines vagabantur.” Varro, in a sentiment precisely similar, says, “Tempus fuit, cum homines rura colerent.” De Re Rust. i. 3. “Temporibus, cum homines vitam agerent.” Varro de Re Rust. i. 2.

For the direction of the junior reader, it may be given as a general rule, to join cum with the subjunctive mood, when it can be turned into “after,” or “while,” without any material injury to the force or meaning of the expression; or when the clause, with which cum is connected, can be rendered participially, either in Latin or in English. Thus, “When he had drawn up his army, he waited for battle.” Cum exercitum instruxisset, prælium exspectabat, or Exercitu instructo. “Having drawn up his army.”—“When he had unexpectedly arrived, they deputed the chief men of the state to wait upon him.”—“Cum de improviso venisset, legatos ad eum primos civitatis miserunt.” Cæs. B. G. ii. 3. Here the clause connected with cum cannot be participially rendered in Latin, the verb venire being intransitive, and the Latins having no perfect participle active; but we can say, in English, “ He having unexpectedly arrived, they sent,” &c. “ When the Romans were retreating on that side—M. Valerius put spurs to his horse.” Cum Romani ab ea parte pedem referrent, M. Valerius subdit calcaria equo, or, Romanis pedem referentibus. “ The Romans retreating.”—“ When he saw that the case was desperate, he said,” Cum rem desperatam esse videret, or, Rem desperatam esse videns, dixit. “ When he was clamorously uttering these words, Servilius put him to death,” Cum hæc vociferaretur, or, Eum, hæc vociferantem, Servilius obtruncavit.

In the use of cum, whether as a conjunction, adverb, or preposition, it is to be observed, that the Romans were generally careful not to place it before a word beginning with the letter n. Hence they never said cum nobis, but nobiscum—not cum notis hominibus, but cum hominibus notis, thus avoiding an indelicacy, which the other collocation would have produced. See Cicero de Orat. and Quintil. lib. viii. And as the letter m, in composition, was pronounced as n, as connecto, conjungo, they generally preferred saying cum paucis, instead of cum nonnullis.

It may be necessary to remind the reader, that the present tense is often used in Latin, where the preterite is employed in English. Thus, “ He said that his brother read every day.” Dixit fratrem quotidie legere. The saying and the reading are conceived as contemporaneous. Legisse would imply, that the reading was prior to the saying, and would denote “had read.”

EXERCISE.

Xenophon, the disciple of Socrates, was offering a solemn sacrifice, when he heard that his eldest son was slain at Mantinea. He did not, however, desist; but only laid down his crown, and asked, how he had fallen. When he understood, that his son had died in the field of battle, fighting bravely in defence of his country, he calmly replaced the crown upon his head; calling the gods to witness, that he received more pleasure from the bravery, than pain from the death, of his son.

OBSERVATIONS.

NOSCERE.	SCIREE.	CALLERE.
----------	---------	----------

Noscere is “to know,” or “to be acquainted with any thing, as an object of perception”—“to have an idea,” or “notion of it, as apprehended by the mind.”—“Novi aedes.” Plaut. Amph. i. 1. 292. “I know the house.”—“Novi hominem.” Plaut. Ep. iv. 1. 8. “I know the man.”—“Noscere vultus eorum potis est.” Lucret. iii. 468. “To know the countenances.”—“Saporem nosse.” Plin. xiii. 4. “To know the taste.”—“Novi omnem rem.” Plaut. “I know the whole affair.”—“Deus, quem mente noscimus.” Cic. de Nat. Deor. “God, whom we apprehend by the intellect,” that is, not by sense.

Novi, the preterite tense of this verb, denotes present knowledge, and past perception. “Novi ego te." Plaut. "I know you from previous experience, or acquaintance."

Scire is to know any thing as a matter of fact, or any truth as an object of conviction; as " Scio omnibus esse moriendum." " I know that all must die." " E servo scis te genitum." Mart. i. 82. 1. " You know, that you are the son of a slave."

The following examples, in each of which both verbs occur, will serve further to illustrate the distinction. " Hominem novi, et dominus qui nunc est, scio." Plaut. Rud. iv. 3, 26. " I know the man personally."—" I am acquainted with him," and " I know who his master is." The latter clause, however, does not necessarily imply any personal knowledge of the master. He might know him only by name. " Non norunt, scio." Plaut. Cas. Prol. " They are not acquainted with the play," not having seen it performed—" this circumstance I know."—" Novi omnes; scio fures esse hic complures." Plaut. Aul. iv. 9, 8. " I have a perfect knowledge of them"—I am fully acquainted with their persons and dispositions. " I know (as a matter of fact) that there are several thieves here." Ch. " Phania ille frater meus fuit." Si. " Noram; et scio." Ter. And. v. 4, 32. " I was acquainted with the man, and I know (as matter of fact) that he was your brother."—" Nam incertiores nullam bestiam novi." Plaut. Stich. iii. 2. 44. " I know of no beast more uncertain," or " I am acquainted with none less to be depended upon." Scio would imply, " I know there is none more uncertain," a proposition materially different from the other. Thus, " Scio, magis curiosam nullam belluam esse." Plaut. Aul. iii. 6. 28.

Scire is used, like Noscere, to denote simply the knowledge of any accident, quality, or property, as existing—thus, " Scire sententiam." Plaut. " Ætatem scibat." Ter. " Causam scire." Mart. vii. 85, 6. But it never denotes an acquaintance with any sensible object, or substance in general, as apprehended by the mind; for though we find such expressions as " Scio hominem, qui sit," it is evident, that the expression means no more than " Scio, qui, or quis, sit homo."

The distinction then between noscere and scire is briefly this. Noscere strictly refers to substance, and its attributes, as objects of perception; and metaphorically to any other object apprehended by the mind. Scire is applied to facts, as known, or truths, as objects of conviction. Hill observes, that ignorance is opposed to scire, and indistinct perception to noscere. In this remark, however, there seems to be a little inaccuracy; for noscere is opposed not only to indistinct perception, but also to entire unacquaintance with the object. When Geta says, " Senis nostri, Dave, fratrem majorem Chremem nostin'?" Ter. Ph. i. 2, 12, if Davus had never seen him, he might with propriety have answered, " Haud novi." When Parmeno says, " Quandoquidem illarum neque te quisquam novit," Ter. Eun. ii. 3. 82, he evidently means, that not one of them knew any thing whatever of the person of Chærea; for Pythias afterwards declares, “Hunc oculis suis nostrarum nunquam quisquam vidit.” Eun. iv. 11. It seems evident, therefore, that Haud novi, is not confined to the sentiment, “I do not distinctly know the object,” but denotes also “I have no knowledge of it whatever.”

Scire, being applied to the knowledge of facts and truths, as objects of conviction, denotes also that knowledge of them, which is the foundation of scientia, or “science.”—“De jure civium dicunt Lyeurgum aut Solonem scisse melius, quam Hyperidem aut Demosthenem.” Cic. And scientia, according to the academics, consisted “In animi notionibus et rationibus.” Cic. Tusc. Quæst. lib. i.

Before dismissing the subject, it may be proper to observe, that, when that ability is implied, which is the result of knowledge or skill, “Scire” is sometimes used for “Nosse”, and “Nescire” frequently for “Non posse.”—Thus we have scire fidibus, that is, scire canere, or posse canere fidibus; scire Latine—with loqui probably understood. And in the well-known observation of Maherbal, “Vincere scis, Hannibal; victoria uti nescis.” Liv. xxii. 51. Sometimes it denotes ability or possibility simply, “Major animus et natura erat, quam ut reus esse sciret.” Liv. lib. xxxviii. cap. 52. “Nescit vox missa reverti.” Hor. De Art. Poët. 390.

The Saxon verb cunnan, whence came the verb now obsolete in England, but still used in Scotland, “I ken,” or “I know,” and also the verb, “I can,” denoted, in like manner, scire, sapere, posse. I can is now used to denote “ability,” or “power,” simply. “Cunning,” or “knowing,” the participle of the verb, is still in use, but has changed its meaning, being employed now, as nearly equivalent to “sly,” or “crafty.” In our translation of the Bible it is, I believe, uniformly used to denote “skilful,” “wise,” “ingenious.”

Callere (from callus, or callum, denoting that hardness of the skin which is occasioned by much labour) signifies, “to be hard like brawn.” It is metaphorically applied to the mind, to denote that state of it, which is the effect of repeated impressions, or much practice in any subject, to which its attention has been directed. “In illis rebus exercitatus animus callere jam debet.” Cic. Ep. Fam. iv. 5. It is thus explained by Perottus: “Callere à callum, quòd, sicut pes ex longo viæ labore callum facit, ita mens longa experientia facit habitum quendam rerum, in quibus versatur.” Callere, therefore, signifies to “know thoroughly,” “to be well practised in.”

EXERCISE.

M. Aurelius, the Roman emperor, applied to the study of wisdom, and attended the lectures of Sextus the philosopher for that purpose. When he was going out of the palace one day, Lucius the philosopher, who had lately come to Rome, met him; and asked him, whither he was going, and on what business. Marcus answered, “It is becoming even for an old man to learn; and I am going to Sextus to learn those things, which I do not yet know.” Lucius raising his hands to heaven, exclaimed, “ O Jupiter, a Roman emperor, now in his old age, goes to school like a boy ! ”

OBSERVATIONS.

Memini, for recordor, “ I remember,” governs the accusative or genitive ; but for mentionem facio, the genitive only.

Qui is frequently, with great elegance, omitted, as, “ Socrates, who was the wisest of all the ancients, was condemned to die,” Socrates (qui erat) omnium veterum sapientissimus, mortis damnatus est. “ The city, which he had thus taken, he levelled with the ground,” Urbem (quam ita ceperat) ita captam solo æquavit.

Partitives, Comparatives, Superlatives, Interrogatives, and Numerals govern the genitive plural, and this genitive may be resolved into the accusative with inter, or the ablative with de, e, ex, as; Doctissimus Romanorum, inter Romanos, or de, e, ex, Romanis. — Pulcherrima sororum, or de, e, ex, sororibus. In such expressions, the adjective is generally of the same gender with that of the substantive, which it governs ; and which is, in fact, understood, as its subject of concord—thus, “ One of the muses,” Una musarum. “ One muse of the muses.” Amplissimum templorum, that is, Amplissimum templum templorum, “ The most spacious temple of temples.” Sometimes, however, it agrees with the preceding substantive—1st. When the genitive is a collective noun, as Præstantissimus nostræ civitatis, “ The most excellent man of our state.’’ Here the genitive singular is equivalent to a genitive plural. 2dly. In heteroclites, as Infimum cœlorum lunam continet. 3dly. When the adjective may refer to a preceding word, as, ‘‘The Indus is the greatest of rivers,’’ Indus est fluminum maximus, where maximus agrees with Indus, and not with flumen, understood. ‘‘Est genus hominum, qui se primos omnium rerum esse volunt.’’ Ter. Eun. ‘‘Quid agis, dulcissime rerum?’’ Hor. Here the superlative agrees with O tu, or O vir, understood. 4thly. When in the word governed there is a syllepsis generum, or the comprehension of two or more genders under one; then one of the words, if not two, must be of a different gender from that of the adjective or pronoun, which it governs. ‘‘Propter summam et doctoris auctoritatem et urbis, quorum alter te scientia augere potest, altera exemplis.’’ Cic. Off. i. 1. Here doctor and urbs are of different genders. By a syllepsis the relative is put in the masculine gender, but the second subject altera, referring to urbs, in the feminine.

Despauter observes, that Terence, when he says, ‘‘Nec quisquam nostrarum novit,’’ Eun. iv. 4, 11, is not to be imitated, because, though quis was originally masculine and feminine, it came afterwards to be confined to the masculine gender. The observation is correct; quis and qui were used by Plautus and Terence, as both masculine and feminine. ‘‘An ita tu es animata, ut qui expers matris imperii sies?’’ Plaut. Asin. iii. 1, 1. This, however, may, in some cases, admit a different explanation, for it is no uncommon thing in Greek and Latin *, to use the masculine gender for the feminine, when distinction of sex is not particularly to be regarded, and the subjects are considered under the general notion of persons.

The superlative being joined to the genitive plural, and this genitive being resolvable into the ablative with e.v., or the accusative with inter, it is evident, that the two subjects of comparison must belong to one class. Such expressions, therefore, as the following, in which two subjects of different classes are compared, as if they belonged to one, should be studiously avoided, “Age, Servi, non solum adolescentum, qui tibi æquævi sunt, sed senum quoque omnium doctissimus.” Macrob. Sat. This, as Despauter observes, is the same as if he had said, “Servius adolescens est omnium senum doctissimus,” by which Servius is made to be at once a young, and an old man. It should have been omnibus senibus doctior, “More learned than all the old men.”

It may preclude a difficulty to the junior reader, if we here remark, that when an adjective refers to one or other indefinitely of two persons, of different sexes, the masculine gender is preferred. Cæsar, speaking of husband and wife, says, “Uter eorum vita superarit.”

B. G. 6. 19.

* “ Deum esse indignam credidi.” Plaut. Pœn. ii. 1, 10.
“ That the Deity (Venus) was angry.” “Αλλά μ' ἀ Διος γ' ἀλλημα θεος.” Soph. Aj. 401. Here θεος refers to Diana.

It is commonly given as a rule, that dum and donec signifying “while,” should be joined to the indicative, and denoting “until,” with the subjunctive mood. The rule is incorrect; and the inaccuracy has arisen from confounding the subjunctive with the potential mood, the distinction between which will afterwards be fully explained. It is more correct to say, that these adverbs are joined to the indicative mood, when no uncertainty or contingency is implied; and with the subjunctive, when futurity or contingency is denoted. “Dum haec aguntur, Cassander incidit in Abderitas.” Justin. xv. 2. While these things are doing, Cassander falls in with the Abderites: “Donec armati confertique abibant, peditum labor in persequendo fuit.” Liv. vi. 13. “Ibi manebat dum hostes flumen trajiciebant,” or “donec hostes flumen trajecerant.” “While the enemy were crossing,” or “till the enemy had crossed.” “Ejus pontis dum ipse abesset custodes reliquit.” Nep. Milt. “While he himself should be absent.” Dum aberat would imply, that the appointment of guards was made in his absence.

EXERCISE.

When Plato had come to the Olympic games, the most crowded of all the assemblies in Greece, he boarded and lodged in the company of persons, of whom he knew nothing, and to whom he was unknown. While he remained at Olympia, he so captivated and attached them to him by the sweetness of his manners, and by his conversations, which were free from all affectation of wisdom, that they rejoiced exceedingly in the society of such a man. He made no mention, however, of the Academy, or of Socrates; he told them, merely, that he was named Plato.

OBSERVATIONS.

DUCO.

FERO.

Ducere and ferre are each of them rendered in English, by the verb “to take;” hence the young scholar is apt to confound them. Ducere is “to take,” “lead,” or “conduct,” as, “Take me (conduct me) to your house,” Duc me. Ferre is “to take,” or “carry,” as, “He took,” or “carried with him, many presents,” Tulit secum.

OSTENDERE.

MONSTRARE.

Ostendere is “to shew,” “to exhibit,” or “present to sight.” Rem ostendere, is Rem spectandam exhibere. “Ostendimus,” says Dumesnil, “quod circa nos est, ut animadvertisatur; monstramus, ut cognitum sit.” Ostendere is to shew, for the purpose of being observed; and generally does not imply, that the object is in sight, or near at hand—and answers to the modern Latin phrase, Videre facio. It implies no desired discrimination, or distinction. Monstrare, “to point out,” generally denotes, that the object is in sight, or near at hand, and implies selection or discrimination. “Shew me the man,” Hominem ostendas, that is, “bring him into my sight.”—“Point out the man,” is Hominem monstrā. “Shew me, which is he.”—“Jamne ostendisti signa nutrici.”

Ter. Eun. v. 3, 5. Monstrasti would mean, “Have you pointed them out, that they may be distinguished.” —“Qui erranti comiter monstrat viam.” Ex. Enn. Cic. Off. lib. ii. Here discrimination or selection is clearly implied—the traveller being supposed to have mistaken the road. Ostendimus, ut videatur; monstramus, ut dignoscatur.

Without is often rendered in Latin by a simple negative, as nec, non, joined to an adjective, or participle, or by in privative, as, “Without tarrying longer,” Nec longius moratus. “They went off, without observing,” Abierunt, haud animadvertisentes. “I said it, without knowing, who he was,” Dixi, quis esset ignarus. “He said so, without having read the letter,” Ita dixit, litteris haud perfectis, or “The letter not having been read.”

The Latin language has no definitive article. Homo means sometimes “a man,” sometimes “the man,” and sometimes “man in the species.” To express an individual definitely, the Greeks employed the article ὁ, ἡ, το, as ὁ αὐτός παραταχθεὶς Θεοῦ “the man.” To denote an individual indefinitely, they omitted the article; but, as they signified the species by the same omission, ambiguity was thus sometimes created *.

* Εγένετο αὐτός παραταχθεὶς οὐπεσταλμένος παραταχθεὶς Θεοῦ may signify either “man in the species was sent,” or “man as an individual.” The author of the article “Grammar” in the “Encyc. Britan.” 3d edition, observes, that the word αὐτός is here restricted to an individual, by its concord with the verb and the participle. If he mean by this observation, that the noun can here signify only one individual, because a singular verb and participle are

The English language possesses, in this respect, a decided superiority over both. We have “a man,” to denote an individual indefinitely; “the man,” to signify an individual definitely; and “man” to express the species. The Latins for the definite article employed the pronoun ille, as Beatus ille, or ille homo, “Happy the man.”

EXERCISE.

When the games were over, and they had come to Athens, Plato received them very kindly. Being very desirous to see the philosopher, they said, “shew us that namesake of yours, the philosopher Plato, the disciple of Socrates, whose reputation is every where so great. Take us to the Academy.” He, softly smiling, as he used to do, said, “I am the man.” His visitors were struck with amazement, when they found that they had been the companions of Plato so long, without knowing him.

OBSERVATIONS.

COMES.	SOCIUS.	SODALIS.
---------------	----------------	-----------------

Comes, “a companion,” or “fellow traveller.” Socius, “a companion,” or “associate,” a generical term, denoting “a member of the same society,” “a sharer or partner in the same fortune.” In the latter acceptation, it is synonymous with consors. Sodalis, joined with it, he certainly errs. Numberless examples might be adduced, to prove the contrary. Αὐθεπτος γενναται κοπω, “man (mankind) is born unto trouble.” Job. v. 7. Here the noun, though not denoting an individual, but a species, is joined to a verb singular. Αὐθεπτος, ει τιμη ων, ου συνει, “man, being in honour, abideth not.” Ps. xix. 12.

“ a companion in amusement, or pleasure.” Comes iter facit; socius cum altero societatem coivit, et aliquid cum alio communiter possidet, aut pari opera et consilio curat: sodalis adolescentiæ nomen est. Ita comes tutus; socius æqualis—sodalis amicus.” Fronto. “ Socii plerumque sunt in rebus seriis et fortunæ subjectis, sodales in rebus levioribus, in conviviis et lusibus.” Valla. To the same purpose nearly is the following distinction of Noltenius :

“ Consortes conjungit amor, socios labor idem;
Missio collegas ad eundem copulat actum:
Consortes fortuna eadem, socios labor idem;
Unum collegas efficit officium;
Ast eadem comites unit via, mensa sodales.”

“ Sacerdos Jovis, cum conjuge et liberis, Deorum monitu, comitem se Elissæ, sociumque fortunæ præbuit.” Justin. lib. xviii. cap. 5.

Gifanius observes, that sodales frequently denotes members of the same college. The propriety, however, of this usage, has been questioned by one or two eminent critics. See Nolt. Lex. Antib.—Pitisc. Lex. Antiq. Rom.—Guther. i. 3. de Vet. Jur. Pont.

In modern Latin, the word Comes is employed to denote “Count,” or “Earl.” In the courts of the Roman emperors there were certain counsellors, who constantly attended the sovereign, and assisted him with their advice. These were called “Comites Augustales.” Having frequent access to the emperor, and possessing considerable influence in all his counsels, they were invested with the most lucrative and honourable appointments. When they left the imperial court, to undertake the government of any town or province, they relinquished the title of "Comites Augustales," and were designated Comites of the town or province, to which they were appointed. Thus, "Comites littoris Saxonici,"—"Counts of the Saxon shore," who were appointed to command the troops on the coast side, and defend the country against the depredations of the Saxons. "Comes Britanniarum," "The Count of Britain." Hence arose the French word compte, and the English count.

Convenio is thus construed, Convenire in urbem, "To come into the city, and assemble." Convenire in urbe, "To assemble in the city, having been there before."* Convenire aliquem, "To speak to any one," or "To have an interview with him." Convenit hoc mihi, "this suits me," or "is convenient to me." Convenit mihi cum illo, "I agree with him."

Palairet considers convenire to govern an accusative by an ellipsis of ad. If this verb were not found in the passive voice in this sense, we should concur with him in opinion ; but when we find classic writers saying, "Mē conventum esse expedit." Ter. "Sunt, qui volent te conventum." Plaut. "Convento Antonio." Cic. we must conclude convenire to be in the sense of "to meet," an active transitive verb.

* This distinction is analogous to that between abdere se in silvas, and abdere se in silvis; the former denoting, that they went into the woods ; the latter, that they were there, before they hid themselves.

The term person is derived from persona; but the reader should understand that they are not mutually equivalent words. Persona means properly "a mask," used by actors on the stage, and hence denotes a mask generally. "Non hominibus tantum, sed et rebus persona demenda est, et reddenda facies sua." Sen. Ep. 24. Goclenius observes, that it never signifies "an intelligent substance," but an association of accidents or qualities. "Si mihi propter res meas gestas hanc imponis personam." Cic. Or. pro Sylla. "Cum dicit," says the critic, "mihi, intelligit substantiam; cum dicit personam, intelligit accidens." "In homine," says Valla, "persona significat qualitatem, qua aliis ab alio differunt." Scaliger offers a similar explanation. "Persona intelligitur status hominis ab animo, aut fortuna. Neque verum est, quod aiunt, significare individuam substantiam rationalem; sed accidens notat, ut servum, liberalem, ingenuum, heroem, senatorem. Itaque cum definivimus ab animo, virtutem et vicia comprehendimus; quum fortunam, libertatem, et contraria: sic enim locuti sunt probati auctores." It means, therefore, the distinctive qualities, or accidents of an individual. Hence "dramatis personæ," denotes certain assemblages of physical, moral, and intellectual qualities, severally constituting the characters in the drama, and exhibited in the persons of the actors. Some critics have considered it as thus synonymous with histrio, or the “ stage player.” But Davus or Parmeno, though each a dramatis persona, is surely different from the histrio, who played the part. To the explanation of the term, given by the critics above quoted, we fully assent, as sanctioned by the usage of the most reputable writers. That, towards the decline of the Latin language, it came to be sometimes employed to denote persons, or individuals, there can be no doubt ; but even when thus used, it seems still to have a reference to distinctive qualities. We cannot concur with Faciolati in thinking, that it was ever used absolutely in the sense of “ homo.”

Ait and inquit correspond to our words, “ he says,” and “ quoth he.” The former is used in direct, as well as in oblique sentences ; it may, therefore, be followed with an infinitive ; inquit introduces the speaker in his own words, and is used only in direct sentences. We may say, “ Aio te, Æacida, Romanos vincere posse,” but not inquam.

EXERCISE.

Dion, being banished from Syracuse, by Dionysius the tyrant, went to Megara. Here, when he wished to have an interview with Theodorus, the chief person of the city, and had gone to his house for that purpose, being detained a long time at the gate, and, after all, refused admittance ; he said to his companion, calmly, “ This must be borne with patience ; perhaps we also, when we were in authority, sometimes did such things.” By this tranquillity of mind, he rendered the circumstances of his banishment far more tolerable.

OBSERVATIONS.

VERITAS.	VERUM.	FIDES.
----------	--------	--------

The Latin termination itas corresponds to the English termination of abstract nouns in ness or ity. Thus, lenitas, “lenity,” or “gentleness.” Veritas accordingly means, “truth,” “trueness,” or “verity,” as Hujus rumoris veritas, “The truth of this rumour.” It has therefore been defined, Conditio ejus, quod verum est. It sometimes means, “veracity,” or “moral truth;” as “Cultor veritatis.” Cic. Off. i. one who cultivates “the moral duty of veracity,” or “the property of speaking truth.”—Verum means “a truth,” or “a true thing.”—“It is truth,” Verum est, i. e. “a truth,” or “true thing.” Fides means “faith,” “honour,” “veracity;” “the congruity between words and sentiments,” and also “between words and actions.”—“Fundamentum justitiae est fides, id est, dictorum conventorumque constantia et veritas.” Cic. Off. lib. i.

A participle governs the case of its own verb, and is incapable of comparison. When it is divested of the idea of time, it becomes a participial, and governs the genitive. It then admits comparison—thus, Amans virtutem, “One at present loving virtue.” Amans virtutis, “A lover of virtue.” Servantior æqui, “One more observant of equity.” Doctus linguam Latinam, “One who has been taught the Latin language.” Doctus linguae Latinæ, (Cic.) “One skilled in Latin.”

MENTIRI.

MENDACIUM DICERE.

We learn from A. Gellius, that Nigidius, a critic of eminence, made the following distinction between Mentiri and Mendacium dicere.—“Qui mentitur, ipse non fallitur, sed alterum fallere conatur; qui mendacium dicit, ipse fallitur. Vir bonus præstare debet, ne mentiatur; prudens, ne mendacium dicat.” A. Gellius adds, “Varie, mehercule, et lepide Nigidius tot sententias in eandem rem, quasi aliud atque aliud diceret, disparavit.” Lib. xi. Cap. 11. This distinction does not appear to be well founded.

For the manner in which credo is construed, see p. 55.

What one is in the habit of doing or saying, is frequently expressed by the preterimperfect tense. The reason will be explained hereafter.

EXERCISE.

Aristides among the Athenians, and Epaminondas among the Thebans, are said to have been such lovers of truth, that they never told a lie even in joke. Atticus, likewise, with whom Cicero lived in the greatest intimacy, neither told, nor could bear, a lie. “I hate that man,” Achilles used to say, “as much as I do the gates of Pluto, who says one thing, and thinks another.”—“Liars,” Aristotle was wont to observe, “gain this, that when they have spoken the truth, they are not believed.” Simplicity and sincerity are most suited to the nature of man.

OBSERVATIONS.

DONUM.

MUNUS.

“Donum Deorum est,” says Donatus, “munus hominum.”—See also Dolet. Comment. Servius observes, that donum is a gift from a superior to an inferior, and that munus implies the reverse. “Dona,” says he, “sunt tantum superiorum, munera sunt inferiorum.” Ulpian is of opinion that donum is the generic term, and munus the special; munus he defines to be donum cum causa, puta natalitium. Dumesnil’s distinction appears more correct and precise. “Donum,” he says, “is purely a gift, no obligation being implied on the part of the giver.” Munus, “a present,” which usage or obligation requires. This distinction has also the authority of Popma.

“Num solus ille dona dat?” Ter. Eun. i. 2, 83. “Porro autem Geta ferietur alio munere, ubi hera pepererit; porro autem alio, ubi erit pueru natalis dies.” Ter. Ph. i. 1, 12. In the latter of these examples, usage, and the obligation thence resulting, are implied; in the former, the presents were voluntary, and tokens of affection.

PERDERE.

AMITTERE.

Amittere is simply “to lose the possession of that, which one has once had.” Perdere is “to lose,” “destroy,” or “throw away uselessly or hurtfully;” thus, Decius, qui se devovisse dicitur, vitam amisit, sed non perdidit. Auct. ad Herenn. (See Varas. de Vi et Usu Quorund. Verb.) “Classes optimæ atque opportunæ amissæ et perditæ.” Cic. in Verr.

With, implying concomitancy, or that one person or thing accompanies another, is rendered by cum; as “he invited Cæsar with his friends,” Cæsarem cum amicis invitavit. In such examples, with is the same as along with.

It may be here remarked, that when cum is used, and the pronoun expressed, the pronoun must be suis; but when et, ac, atque are employed, the pronoun must be is, ille, or iste; thus, “He punished the thief, and his associates,” Sumsit supplicium de fure, cum sociis suis, or et sociis ejus.

EXERCISE.

Ptolemy, having conquered Demetrius, gained greater glory from his moderation, than from his victory; for he dismissed the friends of Demetrius, not only with all their property, but also with valuable presents; saying, that he had not begun the war for the sake of plunder. Not long afterwards, Ptolemy, having engaged with Demetrius a second time, was himself defeated; and, having lost his fleet, fled into Egypt. Demetrius, in return for his kindness, sent him his son, his brother, and all his friends, together with their property.

OBSERVATIONS.

APUD.

CUM.

— Apud means “with,” or “at the house of,” or “among;” as Apud me, “in my house.” Apud

Græcos mos erat, “it was a custom among (or with) the Greeks.” Cum denotes “in company with.”

Apud, it is to be observed, never answers to the question quo; for it never signifies motion to, or towards. This rule is violated in such expressions as this, “Iveram hesterno dic apud principem Hessum.” Ca-sauboni Epist.

COMMON.

“Common,” or “belonging to all,” opposed to proprius, “peculiar,” “belonging to one or a few,” is rendered by communis. Thus, Nomen commune, “a common name,” or “the name common to every one of a whole class.” Nomen proprium, “a proper name,” “the name of an individual.” Vita omnibus animantibus est communis; ratio hominis est propria.

“Common,” “ordinary,” or “vulgar,” opposed to “singular,” or “rare,” is rendered by vulgaris. “Facilia an difficilia, singularia erant, an vulgaria.” Cic. “Rarum, et haud vulgare.” Cic.

FUGERE.

CONFUGERE.

Fugere is “to flee from danger”—generically; confugere is “to flee for protection.”

PERIRE.

INTERIRE.

A distinction is sometimes made between these two verbs, but it is not universally observed. Perire is strictly equivalent to our expression “to be undone,” not implying, however, total and irremediable destruction. Interire, as distinct from this, denotes “to be irretrievably ruined,” “to perish irrecoverably.” “Vel te interisse, vel perisse prædicent. Dum pereas, nihil interduo, dicant vivere.” Plaut. Cap. iii. 5, 33. “Perire levius est, et habet inventionis spem, et non omnium rerum finem.” Facciol.

EXERCISE.

When Augustus Cæsar was supping with Vedius Pollio, one of the slaves broke a crystal vessel. Vedius immediately ordered him to be put to death ; nor was he to die by a common death ; for he ordered him to be thrown into a fish pond full of lampreys. The boy, terrified, fled to the feet of Cæsar for protection. The emperor, shocked at the barbarous order of Pollio, commanded that the boy should be set at liberty, all the crystal vessels to be broken, and the fish pond to be filled up. “What!” said he, “because your vessel has been broken, shall, therefore, the bowels of a human creature be torn in pieces?”

OBSERVATIONS.

It is to be observed, that the verb sum never governs an infinitive mood ; and that it cannot be joined with that mood ; unless that infinitive be either the nominative to it, or supply the place of an accusative before it. Thus, “It is honourable to die for one’s country,” Decorum est pro patria mori—that is, “To die for one’s country is an honourable thing.” Here the infinitive mori is not under the government of the verb est, but is the nominative to it. “I know, that it is honourable to die for one's country," Scio, decorum esse pro patria mori: that is, "I know, that to die for one's country is an honourable thing." Here mori supplies the place of an accusative before esse.

It has been observed, that verbs of causing, effecting, or bringing to pass, are followed by ut. The verb curo, though agreeably to the general rule, it may be followed by ut, is elegantly joined to the future participle passive; thus, "C. Volusenum Quadratum misit, qui eum, per simulationem colloquii, curaret interficiendum." Cæs. B. G. viii. 23.

Future events are frequently, in English, expressed in the present tense, after the verbs to promise, to expect, to hope, and some others. Thus, "He promised to go," Se iturum esse pollicitus est—that is, "that he would go."—"I hope to obtain," Me adepturum esse spero—that is, "that I shall obtain." In colloquial language, the Latins also sometimes use the present for the future tense, after the verbs spero, polliceor, nego, and a few others; thus, Sperat se a me avellere. Ter. Eun. iii. 3, 14. "She hopes to gull," or "that she will gull."—"Dene-gavit se dare granum tritici."—Plaut. Stich. iv. 1, 52, for se daturum esse, "that he would give."—"Jusjurandum pollicitus est dare."—Plaut. Most. v. 1, 36. "He promised to give," for se daturum esse. These, and similar phraseologies, occur chiefly in dramatic writers. Historians and prose writers, in general, employ the future tense, as, “Illud tibi possum polliceri, me curaturum, ut tibi succedatur.” Cic. Ep. Fam. viii. 10.

It may be necessary to caution the reader against the use of seducere for in malam partem allucere, or “to seduce.” There are, indeed, quoted one passage from Quintilian, and one from Tacitus, in which the verb is thus employed; but the readings, if not false, are at least very disputable. In the time of Tertullian the verb was used in this novel acceptation, and this use was continued by theological writers.

EXERCISE.

When Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, had made war on the Romans, and when he and the Roman army were distant from each other only a few miles, the physician of Pyrrhus came by night into the camp of Fabricius, promising to cut off the king by poison, if a reward should be given him, proportioned to the magnitude of the service. Fabricius immediately caused him to be carried back to Pyrrhus, saying, that it was disgraceful to contend with an enemy by poison, and not by arms. On this, the king is reported to have said, “The sun can more easily be diverted from his course, than Fabricius be seduced from the path of honour.”

OBSERVATIONS.

PECUS.

JUMENTUM.

Pecus means “cattle in general,” whether used for clothing, or for food; and is a name, in fact, applicable to all animals—thus, “Lanigerum pecus.” Virg. “Aligerum pecus.” Id. “Squamiferum pecus.” Id.

Jumentum, “cattle used for labour of any kind.” Dumesnil.

JUBEO.

IMPERO.

Jubere is “to bid,” “desire,” or “express one’s wish,” opposed to vetare, “to forbid,” as “Milites incedere jussit.” Cæs. “Jubeo te salvere,”—“I wish you good health.”—“I greet, or salute you.” “Tullum regem populus jussit; patres auctores facti.” Liv. i. 22. “The people expressed their desire to have Tullus king; and the senators gave their sanction.” So likewise, Jubere legem, “to express the desire of a law.”—“Hoc verbo utebantur, cum legem obtinere vellent,” “Volumus jubemusque.” (Steph. Thes.)

Imperare is to order with authority, requiring to be obeyed. “Jubeo et impero.” Ter. “I express my desire, and command you to obey.”

In two of the former editions jubere governing a dative case was considered by us, as it has been by Vossius, and several other critics, to be a Græcism. It seems to be sanctioned, however, in a very few instances, by some writers of the Augustan age, if we can rely on the correctness of the readings. But, when we find in such writers as Cicero or Cæsar an expression, not only repugnant to their usual phraseology, but also to an established principle of the language, we are naturally inclined to doubt the accuracy of the lection.

In writers of the silver and later ages, it unquestionably occurs. Vossius says, that it never governs an accusative, and that the accusative, which follows it, is not under the regimen of the verb, but the accusative before the subsequent infinitive. In this opinion, though supported by the authority of several eminent critics, it appears impossible to concur, without renouncing one of the clearest and best established principles of the Latin language. It is a rule, confirmed, not only by the nature of the thing itself, but also by universal usage, that the accusative after the active verb, expressing the patient or thing acted upon, invariably becomes the nominative to the verb in the passive voice, thus, Hannibal vicit Romanos,—Romani victi sunt ab Hannibale.—The nominative to the active verb must be the agent, and the person, or thing acted upon, is put under the government of the verb. When the passive voice is employed, the person, or thing acted upon, now becomes the principal subject; what was, therefore, in the former example the accusative, now becomes the nominative.

If we find then a passive verb, having regularly a person, or thing, as its nominative, expressing the patient, have we not, consistently with the acknowledged principles of analogy, a right to infer, that the nominative to the passive verb must be its regimen in the active voice? This appears to me so evident, as hardly to require illustration, or to admit dispute. Let us apply the principle to the subject in question. We find jubere has a regular and complete passive voice. We find, for example, “Admissi in tabernaculum, jussique considere.” Curt. vii. 8. “Cum casta vallo cingere juberetur.” Val. Max. ix. 1. Ext. 6. “Lictoribus abire jussis.” Liv. xxiii. 23. “Aliis alio itinere jussis.” Liv. i. 5. and a variety of other similar passages on the purest classical authority. Now, when we observe Curtius saying, “Equites discedere in cornua jusserat,” (viii. 12.) and immediately afterwards, “Jussis subistere cæteris,” equivalent to Cum cæteri jussi essent, have we not reason to affirm, that the equites is under the government of the verb jusserat? It will not be questioned, that we can say, Te ire jubeo, and Tu ire juberis. Do not then the principles of analogy require, that what is the nominative to the passive verb, and expresses the patient, shall be considered as under the government of the active verb, expressing the thing acted upon? Nothing is more evident. Now, were it true, as Vossius supposes, that the accusative te is not governed by jubeo, but is the accusative before the infinitive, and that te ire, taken together, are the regimen of the verb, then it would follow, that this regimen would become the nominative to the passive verb. Are we then allowed to say, Te ire jubetur? Such an expression is not sanctioned by any classical authority.

I contend, therefore, that the accusative after jubere is the regimen of the verb. When Virgil says (if I may be allowed to appeal to poetical usage, merely for illustration) “Ille meas errare boves permisit,” I should, without hesitation, admit, that boves is not under the government of permisit, because boves cannot become the nominative to the passive verb. No good writer would say, Boves errare permisæ sunt, but Bobus errare permisum est. In this case, Boves errare, (Virg.) taken together form the regimen of the verb, and jointly supply the place of an accusative. And if the passive expression of the sentiment in Virgil were adopted, it would be Boves errare permisum est. Here also, it is not the “oxen,” simply, that are permitted, but “their wandering;” and the person to whom the permission was granted might be subjoined, as Boves errare tibi permisum est. But very different is the construction of jubere: for we say, Romanos incedere jussit, and Romani incedere jussi sunt. This, surely, is sufficient evidence, that in the former expression milites is under the government of jussit; for, otherwise, it could not become the nominative to the passive verb.

POTENTIA:

POTESTAS.

Potentia, according to Hill, implies a general command of means infallibly effective in fulfilling every purpose of the agent. “Potentia est ad sua conservanda, et alterius obtinenda idonearum rerum facultas.” Cic. de Inv. It is properly, he observes, the attribute of a sensitive being, but is also applied to things inanimate. Potestas, he says, does not mean “power in general,” but such a degree of it, as to enable the agent to produce the effect, and is always relative. This distinction, I believe, is generally observed : but the definition by Papin, which Dumesnil has adopted, appears to me more clear and more precise.—“Potentia,” says he, “as distinguished from potestas, consists in that which we have ability to do ; potestas, in that which we have permission to do.”—“Potentia in eo quod possumus, potestas in eo quod licet.” Papin. From these two definitions the reader will sufficiently comprehend the difference between potentia and potestas. It may not be unuseful, at the same time, to observe, that potentia is nearly allied to vis or vires, denoting “strength,” “power,” “might,” and is applicable both to persons and things : thus, “Potentia solis.” Virg. “Potentia Neptuni.” Ov. “Potentia magistratum.”—“Potentia Romano-rum.” In these examples, potentia denotes the “power,” “strength,” “force,” or “energy,” of the persons or things spoken of.

Potestas means “power,” “authority,” “dominion,” “jurisdiction,” and is nearly allied to ditio, and imperium—being distinguished from the latter by its denoting “civil,” whereas imperium implies “military power.” Hence the terms ditio and potestas are frequently used as equivalent words : thus, “In potestatem Romanorum sunt redacti.” Liv. “In ditionem redegit.” Id. “Imperio alteri aucti ; alteri ditionis alienae facti.” Liv. i. 25. “Et potestatis suæ ad ultimum manserunt.” Liv. xxiii. 30. “Potentia,” says Priscian, “magis pro vi accipitur, potestas autem pro ditione.” The former answers to the Greek word δύναμις—the latter to ἐξουσία. It is to be observed, however, that potestas is sometimes used in a more extensive sense *.

The following phraseology deserves the attention of the learner. “I have nothing to give,” Nihil est, quod dem, or “I have nothing which I may give.”—“He had nothing to do,” Nil erat, quod faceret. “I shall have nothing to relate,” Nihil erit, quod narrem. This is the form of expression adopted by the best writers almost universally. It is at the same time to be observed, that the Greeks being in the

* An anonymous critic has given, what he terms, an intelligible explanation of potentia and potestas. If intelligibility were the only requisite in our philological distinctions, the task of the critic would be easy indeed. He tells us, that potentia means the energy, which enables us to act, and potestas the exertion of our ability. According to this explanation potentia would be, what logicians term “power in posse,” and potestas “power in esse, or in actu.” The distinction is not justified by usage: it is opposed by numberless examples. When Virgil says, “Ne tenues pluviae, rapidive potentia solis, Aerior, aut Boreæ penetrabile frigus adurat;”

Geo. i. 92.

he is to be understood as proposing something to prevent or counteract, not the latent energy, but the actual power of the sun’s heat. When Juno asks, “Quis Deus in fraudem, quæ dura potentia nostra, Egit?”

Virg. Aen. x. 72.

it is obvious that she means “the exertion of power.” But it is needless to multiply examples; and every classical reader must know, that potestas often denotes not “power in action” but “power or authority to act.”

habit of using ἔχω for possum, this idiom was sometimes adopted by a few Latin writers; and though possum dicere, and habeo quod dicam are not precisely equivalent expressions, habeo dicere, as ἔχω λέγειν, was employed to express both of these affirmations. “Quid habeo dicere?” Cic. pro Cor. Bal. “Nihil habeo ad te scribere.” Id. Ep. ad Att. ii. 22. “Hoc habeo polliceri.” Suet. “Quid habeo precari?” Id. in Cæs. Aug. cap. 58. We do not, however, consider this phraseology as worthy of imitation. And here, I would offer one general observation, which the reader may apply to all cases similar to the present, namely, that it is not the authority of one or two passages, even in reputable authors, which will justify a deviation from their wonted and established phraseology. The most correct writers have their moments of oscitancy and inattention. We discover this failing in the best English authors; and we may fairly presume, that the ancients were not exempted from occasional inadvertencies. “Ut rara vocabula,” says Scheller, “quia sunt paulo ignotiora, sic quoque in primis raras constructiones, licet auctoritate priscorum se tueantur, fugere debemus.” Schel. Præc. p. 601.

When necessity or obligation is implied, the gerund, or the future participle passive, must be used; as, “I have to finish my work.” Opus mihi peragendum est. See p. 26.

EXERCISE.

Pisistratus, the tyrant, conducted himself with the greatest equity in the government of Athens, which he had unjustly seized; and abstracting from his love of power, no citizen was better than he. If he saw any persons walking about idle in the market-place, he called them to him, and asked them, why they were idle. If they answered, that they had neither cattle nor corn, he gave them some, and bade them go, and work. When he appeared in public, two or three boys accompanied him with money to give to the poor.

OBSERVATIONS.

SPECTACULUM.

CONSPECTUS.

VISUS.

Spectaculum, “a sight,” “spectacle,” or “the thing seen,” as spectaculum dirum, “a dreadful sight.” Conspectus, “a sight,” “view,” or “prospect,” as “Id factum magnæ parti peditum Romanorum conspectum abeuntis Albani exercitus intersepsit.” Liv. i. 27,—“prevented great part of the Roman infantry from seeing the departure of the Alban army,” or “intercepted the sight, or view.” Visus, “sight,” or “the power of seeing.”—“Visus est potentia obtuitus.” Steph. “An potest esse ulla tam perpetua discentis intentio, quæ non ut visus oculorum obtuitu continuo fatigetur.” Quint. i. 3. Hence the expressions, “Acer visus.” Plin. viii. 25, “A sharp sight.”—“Hebes visus.” Sen. Herc. Fur. v. 653, “Dim sight.” “Visus deficiens.” Sen. Agam. “An impaired, or failing sight.”—“Sensus, de quibus loquimur quinque sunt; visus, auditus, odoratus, gustus, et tactus.” Macrobi. lib. vii. cap. 1.

INDUERE.

VESTIRE.

Induere is simply “to put on,” opposed to Exuere, “to put off.” Vestire is not only “to dress,” or “clothe,” but also “to furnish clothes,” and is opposed to Despoliare.

Opes, “power,” or “wealth.” Gifanius observes, that Cicero never uses this word for “wealth,” but always for “power.” Hadrianus Cardinalis makes a similar observation, and remarks that, opes is employed by the purest writers to denote that power, which consists in friends, clients, relations, and popular favour. “Divitiae ut utarc, opes ut colare, honores ut laudere.” Cic. de Am. By the poets, and occasionally by a few prose writers, it is employed to denote wealth, or riches.

“Effodiuntur opes irritamenta malorum.”

Ov. Met. i. 140.

Here it particularly alludes to the precious metals—“Ubi familiares opes defecerant.” Sal. “When their private fortunes had been exhausted.” Here, also, it refers chiefly to property.

PROPE.

JUXTA.

These are properly adverbs, though they are often, the latter indeed generally, used as prepositions, governing an accusative case, ad being understood.

Prope denotes simply nearness or propinquity, and admits degrees, expressed by Propius and *Proxime. Intensive words accordingly are joined with it. “Quisnam hic loquitur tam prope?” Plaut. Stich. ii. 2, 6. Hence it is evident, that it does not imply either contiguity, or the closest propinquity. Juxta, from an obsolete verb Jugo for Jungo, denotes not only nearness, but close propinquity, though not absolute contiguity. Hence it admits neither intention, nor remission. “Tam juxta nos,” would be an absurdity.

—“Furiarum maxima juxta Accubat, et manibus prohibet contingere mensas.”

Virg. Aen. vi. 605.

“Juxta cum vino gravem accubat.” V. Max. iv. 3, 3., denoting in the same bed. “Totos dies juxta focum atque ignem agunt.” Tac. de Germ. 17.

It may be necessary to caution the junior reader against an inelegant use of this preposition, very com-

* Palairet has observed, that proxime is joined with an ablative case, by an ellipsis of ab. Here, we apprehend, the learned author has erred. He gives the following example: “Proxime Pompeio in castris sedenti.” Jul. Obseq. 119. p. 174. This example does not prove his position; for the regimen may be in the dative case; and examples occur in favour of this alternative. We find proxime followed by the prepositions a and ab; but I have not discovered any clear example of the ellipsis which the author supposes. When an ellipsis obtains, I believe it to be of the preposition ad, as “Proxime Hispaniam.” Sall. B. J. cap. 22. “Exercitum habere quam proxime hostem.” Cic. Att. vi. 5. The construction of prope and propior confirms this opinion, which are never joined with an ablative. “Prope castra.” Cæs. B. G. i. 22. “Propior hostem.” Hirt. P. B. G. viii. 9.

mon in modern writers. Thus, we find “according to Plato,” “according to the words of Cicero,” “according to the will of God,” “according to the expression of the poet,” frequently rendered by Juxta Platonem, Juxta verba Ciceronis, Juxta voluntatem Dei, Juxta illud poëtæ. It must be acknowledged that this phraseology may plead in its defence the authority of Justin, Hieronymus, and a few other writers of inferior name; but it was never employed by any writer of the Augustan age. We should therefore say; Secundum Platonem, or Ex sententia Platonis, or Judice Platone, Teste Platone. Ut est apud Platonem. Ut Ciceronis verba mea faciam. Ut Dei fert voluntas. Quemadmodum poëta canit.

It is difficult to furnish the scholar with a precise rule for the use of the Latin genitive. One thing he should observe, that he may almost always safely use it, when the expression can be turned into the English genitive, or is already in that form. Thus, “the crown of the king,” or “the king’s crown,” corona regis. “The height of the mountain,” altitudo montis, or “the mountain’s height.” It is true, that the Latin genitive is sometimes used to express of, when it is not thus convertible, as “Liquidi urna,” Hor. Sat. i. 1, 54, “A pitcher of water;” and particularly when the second substantive is accompanied with an adjective, as, Vir summæ prudentiæ, “A man of consummate wisdom;”—but except in such examples, the learner should not use the Latin genitive to express of, unless it be convertible into the English.

We say, Mœnia Trojæ, “The walls of Troy,” or “Troy’s walls”—but we cannot say, Vir Trojæ, “A man of Troy”—but Vir Trojanus.—We say, Viæ Athenarum, “The streets of Athens”—but we cannot say, Miltiades Athenarum, “Miltiades of Athens,”—but Miltiades Atheniensis.

It may, therefore, be useful to admonish the junior scholar, never to put one noun in the genitive, as governed by another, unless the expression be convertible into the English genitive. By adhering to this rule he cannot err; and justifiable deviations from it, which are not many in number, he will easily learn by reading and observation. A few of the most common we shall here specify. 1st. The thing contained is governed by the thing containing, as, cadus olei, “a cask of oil.” 2d. What is done in a given time is governed by that time, as dies doloris *, “a day of grief,” hora cœnæ, “the hour of supper.” 3d. A verbal substantive expressing the agent, governs the thing done in the genitive, as, Actor causarum, “A pleader of causes.” Cultor justitiae, “An observer of justice.” 4th. A measure governs the thing measured, as, Vini sextarius, “A pint and a half of wine.”

It may be necessary to caution the reader also against an inaccuracy, which occurs frequently in modern Latin. In subjoining to the name of any person the name of his estate, or place of abode, it is not uncommon to place the preposition de for of, before the latter substantive, as “Peter of Brussels,” Petrus de Bruxella. “Robert of St. Albans,” Robertus de Verulamio. “James Howard of Rumford,” Jacobus Howard de Rumford. Now, as Despauter truly observes, classical writers never used such modes of expression. They said, “Livius Patavinus,” “Cicero Arpinas,”—“Terentius Afer,” “Aristoteles Stagyrites,” not “Livius de Patavio,” “Cicero de Arpino,” “Terentius de Africa,” “Aristoteles de Stagyra.”

* In cadus olei and dies doloris, there is probably an ellipsis of plenus. See Palairé's Ellipses Latinæ.

The Latin idiom in the use of the verb suppeditare, differs from the English. We say, “To supply any one with any thing.” The Latins, following their general rule, by which the thing given is put in the accusative, said, Suppeditare aliquid alicui.

The junior scholar should observe, that private disbursements of money are generally expressed by, Facere, or impendere, sumptum, or sumptus; facere impensam, or impensas, in rem aliquam; and that erogare is generally confined to the expenditure of public money. V. Maximus, in describing the liberality of Gillias, has applied it to the expenditure of private fortune. Noltenius condemns this usage, but, though not common, it is sanctioned by one or two examples in Cicero.

EXERCISE.

Gillias of Agrigentum, a man richer in mind than in wealth, was constantly employed rather in expending, than in getting money. He erected buildings for public purposes; he exhibited shows to the people; he supplied the poor with food; he gave dowries to young women; he entertained strangers in the kindest manner; and at one time fed and clothed five hundred horsemen, who had been driven on shore near his house by a storm. In short, whatever Gillias possessed, he seemed to consider as the common patrimony of all men.

OBSERVATIONS.

OMNES.

CUNCTI.

“Cuncti significat quod omnes, sed conjuneti et conjugati; at vero omnes, etiamsi diversis in locis sint.” Gifan. (Vid. Verwey's Thes. p. 103.)—Apuleius explains cunctum to be “non sigillatim ac discretim, sed coacervatim.”—Omnes, “all,” therefore, is opposed to nullus, “none,” or any partitive.—Cuncti, “all,” is opposed to Sejuncti or Diversi—and means “all together,” or “considered as one aggregate,” quasi ad unum versi.

Universi is opposed to singuli, as “Ex iis rebus universis eloquentia constat, quibus in singulis elaborare permagnum est.” Cic. de Orat. i. 5. Some critics have defined universi, as meaning, “all at one time,” while cuncti means “all in one place.” This distinction, though it may have some foundation, is rarely observed.

It may be proper here to apprise the young reader, that, though sed is not used for but (bot), or moreover, unless when followed by etiam, and then the latter conjunction indicates the addition, autem is often used in an adversative sense, and in the same meaning with sed.

Cellarius observes, that comic writers sometimes use “Omnis,” after “Sine,” instead of “Ullus,” and that Cicero, with all his contemporaries, uniformly use the latter, as “Sine ullo tecto.”—“Sine ullo sensu.”—“Sine ullo dolore.” That the latter phraseology is far preferable, being much more conformable to the general usage of classic writers, there can be no question: but we find the other form of expression in Plautus, in Terence, in Ovid, and once even in Cicero himself. “Sine omni periculo.” Ter. And. ii. 3. 17. “Sine omni malitia.” Plaut. Bacch. v. 2. 13. “Omni sine labe.” Ov. Trist. iv. 8. 33. “Sine omni sapientia.” Cic. Orat. ii. 1.

It has been already observed, that verbs of advising are generally followed by ut, as “Monere, ut magnam infamiam fugiant, non desistimus.” Cic. Ep. Fam. 1. “Idque ut facias, te etiam atque etiam hortor.” Cic. Ep. Fam. 6. “Suasit senatui, ut legatos cum virginibus Vestalibus mitterent; pacem, aut certe tempus ad consultandum, petituros.” Suet. in Vit. A. Vitell. cap. 16. They are sometimes, though rarely, found with an infinitive. I am aware that Vorstius has delivered a contrary opinion, affirming that hortari is, by good writers, joined with the infinitive, rather than with ut and the subjunctive mood. He seems even to extend the observation to all verbs of advising. To what authority he would have appealed (for the few examples which he has adduced, are nothing towards the establishment of a general rule), in favour of this opinion, I am utterly at a loss to conceive ; so contrary is it to the general practice of the purest classics. That hortari and suadere are sometimes joined to an infinitive, is readily admitted. “ Res ipsa hortari videtur, quoniam tempus admonuit, supra repetere.” Sall. B. C. cap. 5. “ Egregiis virorum pariter ac feminarum operibus fortitudo se oculis hominum subjicit, patientiamque in medium procedere hortata est.” Val. Max. iii. 3. But that the infinitive is the most common and most elegant form of construction, is an assertion altogether unfounded. I know of no prose writer, with whom this construction is so common as the subjunctive form of expression ; and in Cicero, Cæsar, and Livy, it seldom, or never, occurs. The examples now quoted from Justin, Valerius Maximus, and Sallust, are the only examples, which I have remarked, in my perusal of these authors. If there be any others, their number bears no proportion to those of the contrary usage.

Critics, it is apprehended, have been led into error on this subject, by confounding two distinct significations, which belong to some verbs of advising. Thus, Monere signifies “to advise to any action,” or “to apprise, by way of counsel, of any truth or fact.” In the former sense, it is construed almost uniformly with ut, and, in the latter, it is joined with the infinitive, and admits no other construction. Thus, “A philosophia eum mater avertit, monens imperaturo contrarium esse.” Suet. in Ner. cap. 52. Here monere denotes information, rather than advice. The clause following the participle does not express any mode of action recommended ; but that counsel, which is conveyed by the statement of a fact. So also in the following example, “ Monentibus amicis cavendum esse Mutium.” Id. in Flav. Vesp. cap. 14, “ His friends telling him, by way of caution or admonition, that Mutius ought to be guarded against.” But when advice to action is implied, the action recommended is almost uniformly expressed by ut. The same author says, “ Monitus est, ut vim multitudinis caveret.”

In the same manner, persuadere, when it denotes “ to persuade,” that is, “ to advise thoroughly,” or “ with effect,” is very generally followed by ut; when it signifies “ to persuade,” or “ to convince,” it is uniformly followed by an infinitive. Of these two modes of construction, we shall afterwards have occasion to produce several examples.

It may, therefore, be delivered to the scholar as an incontestable rule, that verbs of advising are almost uniformly followed by ut, with the subjunctive mood, expressing the thing recommended to be done; and, that monere is seldom, or never joined with an infinitive, unless when it implies the communication of a fact.

There are more examples of the government of an infinitive by a noun substantive, than some grammarians have supposed. “ Consilium ceperunt oppido fugere.” Cæs. B. G. vii. 26. “ Corpora curare tempus est.” Liv. xxi. 54. “ Libido gratificari.” Sall. B. J. cap. 3. “ Cupidine superare.” Just. xii. 7. We would not, however, recommend this usage to the adoption of the reader, unless where the expression has the sanction of reputable authority. The gerund in di after a substantive is the more common phraseology.

EXERCISE.

Antisthenes, the philosopher, used to exhort his scholars to pay great attention to their studies ; but few of them complied with his advice. At last, being in a passion, he turned them all away. Diogenes, however, who was one of the number, being inflamed with a great desire to hear the lectures of the philosopher, came frequently to his school, and resolutely stuck to him. Antisthenes threatened, that he would break his head with a staff, which he used to carry ; and when he saw, that Diogenes was not frightened away by this threat, he one day did actually beat him.

OBSERVATIONS.

It has been already observed, that the proper signs of the present potential are may, can, will, and shall. It has likewise been observed, that, when the verb preceding ut is in the present, or future, tense, the verb following ut, if expressing an action, either contemporaneous, or conceived to be contemporaneous, with that of the verb preceding, is put in the present subjunctive ; and, if the preceding verb be in any of the preterite tenses, the verb following ut is in the preterimperfect, or the preterperfect, tense. “ Velim, quam plurimum tecum habeas.” Cic. ad Brut. 1. “ Quod ut facias, te etiam atque etiam rogo.” Cic.

Ep. Fam. 13. “Tantum abest, ut meam sententiam moveat.” Cic. ad Att. vii. 3. “Ego curabo, ne quid verborum duit.” Ter. Ph. iv. 5. 1. “Cura, ut valeas.” Cic. ad Att. vii. 10. “Ita iter feci, ut legati convenirent.” Cic. ad Att. iv. 1. “Nec ipse adduci potuisset, ut a me discederet.” Cic. Ep. Fam. xiii. 57.

This rule, however, though very generally, is not universally observed. Cæsar says, “Persuadet Castico, ut regnum occuparet.” B. G. cap. 3. “Facere possum, ut essem.”* Cic. de Leg. Agr. “Dumnorigi, ut idem conaretur, persuadet.” Cæs. B. G. lib. i. cap. 3. In these three examples, the preterimperfect follows the present. This form of expression, however, is far less usual than the other, and much less agreeable to the natural and established association of the tenses. In the following, we have the preceding verb in the preterite, and the subsequent in the present tense. “Summonuit, ut vestem cum illo mutem.” Ter. Ph. iii. 5. 24. The latter of these phraseologies, however, seems more consistent with strict propriety, than the former, the present tense expressing either the act simply, or denoting time present, in relation to the primary verb, and not absolutely. Ut mutem may be considered as synonymous with mutare. “He advised me to change,” or “He advised my changing.”†

* Ernesti writes Sim.

† It has been questioned, whether the present tense denotes time at all; and, if it does denote present time, whether it signifies that time expressly or inferentially. I am inclined to think,

When the two actions are not contemporaneous, the rule here given does not hold; thus, “Velim, ut vitasses.” Cic. Ep. ad Ter. xvi. 9, “I wish that you had avoided.”—“Timeo, ne fecerit.” Cic. “I fear, lest he may have done it.”—“Vellem, eum tecum abduxisses.” Cic. “I wish, that you had taken him with you.” Fratriis culpa factum est, ut miser sim, and Fratriis culpa factum est, ut miser essem, mean, as Scheller observes, two different things. The former implies, that I am now—the latter, that I was—miserable.

It is to be remembered also, that the preterite definite, in English, is a compound tense, made up of the present tense of the verb “to have,” and the perfect participle. Hence it always refers to present that its real and proper character is to denote the act simply, and that the time is always inferred. To examine this question with accuracy, would occupy several pages; I shall, therefore, only submit to the learned reader the two following observations: 1st. We find this tense employed to denote universal truths, or propositions at all times true, involving, therefore, the present, the past, and the future. Thus, “Ex nihilo nihil fit.”—“Omnes eodem cogimur.”—“Sol terram calefacit.”—“Death spares no man.” 2dly. We find it, when employed to express particular facts, denoting sometimes the present, sometimes the past, and sometimes the future. “Ego hinc abeo.” Ter. Eun. iii. 2. 41. “I will go away.” “Quia cum inde abeo, jam tunc cœperat turba inter eos.” Ter. Eun. iv. 4. 57, “When I went away.” “Hos prius introducam, et quæ volo simul imperabo; postea continuo exeo.” Ter. Eun. iii. 2. 40, “And then I'll immediately come out.” In English, this use of the present tense is, in colloquial language, still more common.

time, denoting an action continued either actually, or in its effect, to the present moment. In Latin, the English preterites definite and indefinite are each expressed by the same tense, as Docui, “I have taught,” and also, “I taught.” The preterite definite, therefore, having always a reference to present time, the particle ut, when it follows this tense, is frequently joined to the present subjunctive, and not the imperfect. “Ea ne (ut non) me celet, consuefeci filium.” Ter. Ad. i. 1. 29., “I have accustomed my son, not to conceal.”—“Balbus ad me scripsit, tanta se epiphora oppressum, ut loqui non possit.” Cic. ad Ter. xvi. 23., “Balbus has written.” “Itaque ad reliquos hic quoque labor accessit, ut omnes adhibeant machinas ad tenendum adolescentem.” Cic. ad Brut. 17., “This labour has been added.”—“Itane parasti te, ut spes nulla in te siet?” Ter. Eun. ii. 2. 9. When the preceding verb, whether rendered in English by the preterite definite, or not, refers to present time, the same observation is applicable. “Quam inique comparatum est, ii, qui minus habent, ut semper aliquid addant divitioribus!” Ter. Ph. i. 1. 7.

The present and the preterite definite so naturally harmonize, that we find them connected in a variety of instances,

—“Saltat Milonius, ut semel icto Accessit fervor capiti, numerusque lucernis.”

Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 25.

“Si est, culpam ut Antipho in se admiserit.”

Ter. Ph. i. 5. 40., “ If it be, that Antipho has committed.”

In rendering also Latin into English, it is necessary to attend to this combination of tenses. If we say, “ Ita conturbasti mihi rationes omnes, ut eam non possem tradere suis,” the tense possem clearly indicates that conturbasti is to be considered as the preterite indefinite, and that the meaning is, “ You so deranged all my plans, that I could not.” But when Thais says, “ Ita conturbasti, ut non possim,” Ter. Eun. v. 2. 29., the latter verb, by its tense, evidently shews, that the preceding verb is to be considered as the preterite definite, and that the meaning is, “ You have so deranged, that I cannot.” *

The observations here offered respecting ut, are applicable to all relative terms, and to interrogative words taken indefinitely, and also to most of the conjunctions, as qui, quantus, quis, cur, quin, quo minus, ne, nisi, &c.

Adjectives signifying desire or disdain, knowledge or ignorance, innocence or guilt, also verbals in ax, and participials in ns, govern the genitive case.

EXERCISE.

Diogenes, however, did not go away. “ Strike,” said

* As the order of nature is maintained by a succession of contraries, the termination of one state of things naturally implies the commencement of its contrary. Hence the preterite definite is employed to denote an event the contrary of that, which the verb expresses. Thus vixit, “ he has lived,” signifies “ he is dead.” “ Fuit Ilium,” “ Troy has been,” or “ Troy is no more.”

he, “ if you please ; I present to you my head ; but you will not find any staff so hard, that it will drive me from your school. I love you, and am desirous to hear your prelections. I have prevailed on myself to submit to any thing, for the sake of knowledge.” Antisthenes, perceiving that he was very fond of learning, took him back, and conceived a great affection for him. “ Nature,” says Tully, “ has implanted in man an insatiable desire to search for truth, that he may become wiser and better.”

OBSERVATIONS.

PUGNA. PUGNARE. PRÆLIUM. PRÆLIARI.

That these words are not precisely, as one or two critics have supposed, respectively synonymous, must be evident from the two following examples : “ Prælia pugnasque edere.” Lucret. ii. 117. “ Pugnare, et prælia obire.” Id. iv. 965. “ Habeant reges sibi pugnas, sibi prælia.” Plaut. Curc. i. 3. 22. What the distinction is, it may be somewhat difficult to ascertain. That, like many other synonyms, they are often used indiscriminately, when no misconception is to be apprehended, will not be questioned. They agree in denoting a contest for an object, and are included in the generic terms, certare and certamen. Hence, they are used indifferently, when merely the general idea of a contest is implied. “ Quibuscum ego non pugno, utrum sit melius, an verius.” Cic. de Orat. lib. i. “ I do not dispute.” “ Vehementer præliatus sum.” Cic. ad Att. lib. i. 16. Here pugnare and præliari are equivalent to Verbis certare, vel contendere.

According to Valla, prælium denotes “a contest of armed men;” pugna, “a battle, with or without arms.” To this distinction Noltenius objects, observing, that præliari is often used, when arms are not implied. See Cic. ad Att. i. 16.—also Dolet. Com.

Isidorus defines bellum, pugna, and prælium thus. “Bellum universum dicitur, ut Punicum; hujus partes sunt pugnæ, ut Cannensis. Rursus, in una pugna sunt multa prælia. Bellum igitur est totum; pugna unius diei; prælium pars pugnæ est.” Isid. xviii. 1.

Hill adopts the following distinction. “Prælium,” he says, “denotes one of those conflicts which make part of Bellum, a war between contending nations; while pugna has a more extensive meaning, being applicable not only to one of those conflicts, but also to combats and squabbles between individuals, originating in a private concern.” Of these several explanations, that of Isidorus excepted, each has some foundation in truth.

Though etymology is by no means, in all cases, a safe guide, it frequently serves to assist us, in ascertaining the distinctive meaning of synonymous words. Pugnus and pugna are evidently derived from πύξ, pugno vel pugnis; the hand or fist, previously to the invention of arms, being doubtless the chief instrument of attack and defence. “Namque veteres,” says Donatus, “ante usum ferri, et armorum, pugnis, et calcibus et morsibus, corporum luctatione certabant.” Donat. in Proleg. Hec.

“ Unguis et pugnis, dein fustibus, atque ita porro Pugnabant armis, quæ post fabricaverat usus.”

Hor. Sat. i. 3. 101.

Hence it is said by Donatus, who in this is followed by Popma, Doletus, Dumesnil, and several others, that pugna means “ a battle,” in which the combatants came to close quarters; and prælrium “ a battle, in general.” In this distinction, we are inclined to concur. But it may be further observed, in accordance with Hill’s explanation, that, as pugna originally denoted “ a fight with fists,” implying close action, and the manual force of the contending parties, we have some reason to conclude, that this idea continued to be conveyed by the term pugna, and that it referred chiefly to the closeness of the fight, and the physical exertions of the combatants. Prælrium, on the contrary, expresses rather the state of battle, in whatever manner conducted, as bellum denotes a state of warfare. And, while acies signifies the field of action, prælrium refers to the whole scene, or the battle generally, including the evolutions, and manœuvres practised by each party, while pugna directs the attention chiefly to their manual exertions. From a variety of examples too, we should be inclined to think, that, while pugna may be either long or short, with or without preparation, prælrium denotes a contention of some length, for which generally preparation is made. “ Sed hoc superari, quod diuturnitate pugnæ defessi prælio excedebat; alii integris viribus succedebant.” Cæs. B. G. iii. 4. “ Wearied by the long continuance of their exertions, they quitted the battle.” “Ego enim, quamdiu senatus auctoritas mihi defendenda fuit, sic aeriter et vehementer præliatus sum, ut clamor concursusque, maxima cum mea laude, fierent.” Here præliari expresses “a continued contention.” He adds, alluding to the same subject; “Te non solum auctorem consiliorum meorum, verum etiam spectatorem pugnarum mirificarum desideravi.” Cic. ad Att. i. 15. Here the term pugnarum refers to the individual exertions; and it is manifest, contrary to the opinion of Isidorus, that pugnæ were only parts of the prælium, and that the latter consisted of the efforts implied in the former.

The distinction here offered between those words, appears to receive some confirmation from this circumstance, that bellum and prælium are sometimes used indiscriminately, each denoting “a state of warfare,” or “a state of battle;” but pugna, as far as our observation has extended, is never used for bellum. See Justin. iii. 6. ii. 12. ix. 4. Liv. xxxi. 2. xxi. 8.

The words to and for, signs of the Latin dative, are in English frequently omitted, as, “He bought me a book,” Emit librum mihi, that is, “He bought a book for me.”—“I told you this,” Hoc tibi dixi, or “I told this to you.”

Deducere est a terra in mare, subducere e mari in terram. Some modern writers have not attended to this distinction.

It has been remarked, that we say in English,

“ to communicate a thing to any one,” but in Latin, communicare aliquid cum aliquo. When a thing is imparted by one person to another, this is the classical mode of expression. We find in Cæsar three examples, in which the verb governs a dative case; but in one of them the reading has been questioned, and in the other two, the verb may be construed absolutely. It seems, however, to have escaped the attention of critics, when they have censured the use of the dative case, that this case is admissible, when the verb means “ to give in common to two or more individuals,” the giver himself having no share of the gift. Thus, “ Sibi communicatum cum illo, non ademtum esse, imperium.” Liv. xxii. 27. The givers here were the Roman senate; the participants, Minucius and Q. Fabius.

EXERCISE.

Themistocles, having conquered the Persians in a naval fight, said, in an assembly at Athens, that he had a plan in contemplation which would be serviceable to the state, but that it was necessary it should not be made public. He, therefore, demanded a person to whom he might communicate it; and Aristides was appointed for that purpose. He then told Aristides, that the fleet of the Lacedemonians, which had gone into harbour at Gytheum, might be secretly set on fire, and thus the naval power of the Lacedemonians be destroyed.

OBSERVATIONS.

CŒTUS.	CONCIO.	CONVENTUS.	COMITIA.
	CONCILIUM.		CONSILIIUM.

These words are thus distinguished by Dumesnil —Cœtus, “An assembly of few, or more, for business or amusement.” Comitia, “An assembly for the election of magistrates.” Concio *, “An assembly of soldiers, or commons, for hearing an oration.” Concilium, “An assembly of chiefs, for the purpose of deliberation, or the enactment of laws.”—“Dimissa concione, concilium habitum.” Liv. ix. 15. “The assembly of the soldiers being dismissed, a council of war was held.” Conventus, “A meeting, or assembly, for the celebration of a festival, the purposes of traffic, or the administration of justice.”—“Agere convenitus.” Cæs. “To hold the assizes.”

The explanation here given by Dumesnil of the word concilium is not perfectly correct. Gronovius has endeavoured to prove, and, I think, very successfully, that in the passage quoted from Livy, consilium is the true reading, and not concilium. He contends, that the latter means an assembly of the people, or an assembly of deputies from several nations, or bodies of men, as Bœoticum concilium, Achaicum concilium; and that consilium means a meeting of counsellors, or chiefs. The consilium of the Roman generals, he says, were the lieutenants, and the tribunes of the soldiers, whom they used to summon for the purpose of consultation; and the consilium of the pretors were the judges, and the assessors, or assistants. In this opinion Drakenborch concurs. Stephans agrees with Gronovius in defining concilium to be conventus populi, et multitudo populorum diversorum, in unum locum consulendi gratia congregata; and, he observes, that concilium properly means “a meeting of the commons only, summoned by the senators, and not of the whole Roman people.” (See also A. Gell. xv. 22.) Turnebus, whose opinion also seems to coincide with that of Gronovius, says, that consilium means frequently, a military council for assisting the general in deliberation.—Consilium habitum, therefore, as it stands in all the oldest editions, seems to be much the preferable reading.

* “Verpii, opinor, Flacci erat in quo scripta . . . hæc fuerunt, senatum dici et pro loco, et pro hominibus; civitatem et pro loco, et pro oppido, et pro jure quoque omnium, et pro multitudine hominum; tribus quoque et decurias dici et pro loco, et pro jure, et pro hominibus; concionem autem tria significare, locum, et verba, suggestumque unde verba fierent.” A. Gellius, 18. 7.

We find sometimes an ellipsis of concilium. “Quomodo iste commune Milyadum vexârit.” Cic. in Verr.

In addition to the numerous examples adduced by Gronovius, to prove that consilium means, sometimes, a military council, that is, either the meeting itself, or those who compose it, we quote the following passage from Tacitus, “Addidit classi urbanas cohortes, atque ipsis ducibus consilium, et custodes.” Tac. Hist. i. 87. That consilium denotes a deliberative assembly, is still further confirmed by the authority of Cicero. “Senatus est sumnum populi Romani populorumque et gentium omnium ac regum consilium.” Cic. pro Dom. “Nulla est in hac urbe societas publicanorum, nullum collegium, nullum concilium, nullum denique commune consilium, quod non,” &c. Cic. pro Dom. “Concilium,” says Gisanius, “is conventus plebis, quem indixisset tribunus.” Cic. in Vat. He adds, “Consilium fit de paucorum, et selectorum virorum, Concilium variorum sine delectu coeuntium aut confluentium cœtu, seu turba.” The observations of Schorus are to the same purpose. These authorities, supported as they are by classical usage, in general, are sufficient to prove that consilium denotes an assembly of chiefs, or leading men, for the purpose of deliberation; and that concilium signifies a promiscuous assembly, or one composed of the inferior orders.—Consilium also signifies “an advice,” “plan,” or “scheme,” “policy,” “presence of mind.”

QUIDEM.

EQUIDEM.

Some have supposed, that, while quidem may be joined to any of the three persons, and to either of the numbers, equidem, compounded, as they say, of ego and quidem, can be joined to the first person singular only. This is a mistake. It may be joined to any person, and either number. Of this, a variety of examples might be produced. “Jampridem equidem nos vera rerum vocabula amisimus.” Sall. B. C. cap. liv. “Vanum equidem hoc consilium est.” Ibid.

“ Evidem id erat primum.” Cic. ad Att. “ Non equidem hoc dubites.” Pers. v. 45. (Vid. Gifan. Obs. in Ling. Lat.)

The words ne quidem, “ not even,” are always separated. “ Sed querelæ, ne tum quidem gratæ futuræ.” Liv. præf. “ Ne hostis quidem approbavit.” Cic. Off. lib. i. “ Me vero nihil istorum ne juvenem quidem movit unquam.” Cic.

Note, that the postpositive conjunctions, so called, because they are never used as introductory words in a sentence or clause, but always put in the second or third place, are autem, enim, vero, quoque, quidem—thus, we say, Sed ille, or Ille autem—Nam legit, or Legit enim—but not, Autem ille, or Enim legit.

REPUDIARE.

REJICERE.

Repudiare (ex re et pudet) signifies “ not to accept,” or, after having accepted, to dismiss, or put away, a thing of which you are ashamed. “ Ita dictum,” says Festus, “ quod fit ob rem pudendam.” It always conveys the idea, that the thing offered, or received, is unworthy of the person, to whom it is offered.—Rejicere is simply “ to reject,” for whatever cause; and is opposed to Deligere. “ Orat vos Avitus, judices, ne se matri, cuius vota et preces a vestris mentibus repudiare debetis—condonetis.” Cic. pro Cluent. ad fin. “ Deligit bona, rejicit contraria.” Cic. “ Repudiatae rejectæque legationis manebit testificatio semipiterna.” Cic. Phil. ix. ad fin.

EXERCISE.

Aristides, having heard this, returned to the assembly, and told them, that the plan of Themistocles was, indeed, a very useful one, but by no means honourable. The Athenians, judging that to be unprofitable, which was not honourable, rejected, on the authority of Aristides, a plan, which they had not even heard. We are born for justice ; nor is right founded in opinion, but in nature. Cicero observes, that justice is the queen of virtues. Let it then be a fixt principle with us, that what is dishonourable is never useful.

OBSERVATIONS.

FACUNDIA.

ELOQUENTIA.

“Facundi,” says Varro, “sunt, qui facile fantur; eloquentes, qui facile et bene.” These words, however, as also facundia and eloquentia are often used indiscriminately; but that they are not precisely synonymous, is evident from Quintilian’s observation, “Alere facundiam vires augere eloquentiæ possit.” In Proem. Facundia seems to refer to “grace and facility” in speaking; eloquentia includes these and also all the other requisites for persuasion. Facundiā auditorum animos conciliamus; eloquentiā etiam persuademus.

DEDERE.

TRADERE.

Dedere signifies “to give up,” “surrender,” or “devote.” “Se dedere ad scribendum.” Cic. “Tibi me dedo.” Ter. Tradere (transdare), “to deliver,” or “transmit.” Dedere implies, that the person, or thing, surrendered is put under the power, and direction of the person, to whom it is given, for an unlimited time, as if it were his own. Tradere denotes, that the mere possession is transferred, but not the right of property, or ownership. Dare est quod repetas—dedere est ad perpetuum—Damus amicis—dedimus hostibus.—This is the distinction between dare and dedere.—Dare and tradere may be distinguished thus—Dare est transfundere in alium dominium rei.—Tradere est nudam rei possessionem alteri cedere non proprietatem. “Itaque,” says Popma, “si quis stipuletur rem suam sibi dari, erit inutilis stipulatio; at, contra, utilis, si tradi stipuletur.” In a metaphorical sense, tradere and dedere are frequently used indiscriminately. Thus we find, Dedere se studio—and Tradere se studiis used by Cicero, and Tradere se quieti used by Pliny.

Grammarians do not seem quite agreed concerning the rule of Apposition, or the concord of one substantive with another. Despauter seems to think, that two substantives in apposition, cannot, with propriety, be of different numbers; and observes, that this diversity can only take place, when the one wants the number of the other, or is a collective noun. Vossius, on the contrary, denies it to be necessary, that the nouns should agree either in gender or in number; citing, Aquila rex avium. Tempus magister mulorum. Urbs Philippi. Ruddiman concurs with Vossius, and extends the rule, observing, that they need not agree either in gender, or in number, or in person; and remarks, as if there were no discordance of opinion between him and Despauter, that the latter admits a difference of number in the two cases above mentioned.—Thus it appears, that while Vossius and Ruddiman assert the admissibility of different numbers, as the general rule, Despauter is inclined to contend for an identity of number, subject to two exceptions. Now, it seems very evident, that, wherever the words admitted accordance in gender, they were uniformly made to agree. They said, tempus magister multorum, by necessity, magister having no neuter; but they did not say, Historia magister vitæ, but magistra: not virtus socius vitæ, but socia. Cic. Ultor gladius, ultrix cura. We believe, that they were guided by a similar principle, in respect to number, in all cases, where the according or modifying word partakes of the nature of an adjective, as in the terms, inventor inventrix, cultor cultrix, nutritor nutrix, thus, “Omnium doctrinarum inventrices Athenas.” Cic. de Orat. lib. i. On this subject, we would not be understood to deliver a decided opinion; but we are rather inclined to adopt the doctrine of Despauter, and say, that the modifying substantive should agree with the other in number, when that agreement is possible. A collective noun cannot be said to form an exception, its singular being equivalent to a plural, as, “Turba ruunt in me luxuriosa procī.” The following example, which I find in Ovid, favours the opinion of Despauter. “Testes estote Philippi." Fast. iii. 707. Here the appellative, according with a proper name expressing a single object, is put in the plural number, because Philippi is plural. Would Philippi testis be admissible?

EXERCISE.

Anaxagoras, of Clazomene, was illustrious not only for his wealth, and the nobility of his birth, but also for the greatness of his mind. In order that he might deliver himself up entirely to the study of philosophy, he surrendered his patrimony to his friends, and went to Athens, the nurse of literature at that time. There Pericles became his scholar, a man of exalted mind, of uncommon eloquence, and very bountiful to the poor. It happened, however, that, being much engaged in public affairs, Pericles seemed to neglect his master, Anaxagoras.

OBSERVATIONS.

DOMINUS. HERUS. PRÆCEPTOR.

Dominus denotes not only "the master of a house," but also, "the owner of any property whatever." Herus is "a master in relation to his servants," herus being the correlative term to famulus and servus. "Me aut herum pessum dabunt." Ter. And. i. 3. "They will ruin me, or my master," said the slave Davus. "Iis sit sane adhibenda sævitia, ut herus in famulos." Cic. Magister, "a master," "overseer," or "superior,"—also, "a person skilled in any art or science,"—hence, sometimes, "a teacher,"—thus, Magister pecorum, Magister equitum, Ma- gister artis. It is derived from magis, and is opposed to minister, from minus. In the following distinction by Varro, it is considered as synonymous with Præceptor. “Educit enim obstetrix, educat nutrix, instituit pædagogus, docet magister.” Varro de lib. educat. Præceptor, “a master,” or “teacher.” (See Gifan. page 66, Verwey's Thes.)

EXERCISE.

The old man, perceiving this, went to bed, and, wrapping up his head, determined to starve himself to death. Pericles, having heard this circumstance, flew to his master, and, with tears, besought him to live, and to preserve to him that wisdom, and that light, which had been of so much service to him. Anaxagoras, uncovering his head, mildly said, “Pericles, those, who have need of a lamp, feed it with oil.” From that time Pericles paid great attention to Anaxagoras; and, indeed, not long afterwards, saved his life.

OBSERVATIONS.

IMPERATOR.

DUX.

Dux is a general or leader, subordinate to Imperator. Imperator præest toti exercitui; dux parti alicui. “Namque Leuctrica pugna imperatore Epa-minonda, hic fuit dux delectæ manus.” (Nepos in Epam.) Vid. Gif. de differentiis.

DUCERE.

NUBERE.

Ducere, “to marry,” or “to take in marriage,” is used when a man is the subject of discourse, or the nominative to the verb. “Veteribus enim mos fuit, nuptam e patris domo noctu tædis ardentibus prælatis velatam, in mariti domum deduci.” Donat. “Itane tandem uxorem duxit Antipho?” Ter. Ph. i. 5. 1. Nubere, “to be veiled,” or duci, “to be led,” is used, when a woman is the subject of discourse, or nominative to the verb. “His duobus, ut ante dictum est, duæ Tulliæ, regis filiæ nupserant.” Liv. i. 46. “Lucumoni contra, omnium hæredi bonorum, quum divitiæ jam animos facerent, auxit ducta in matrimonium Tanaquil, summo loco nata; et quæ haud facile iis, in quibus nata erat, humiliora sineret ea, quæ innupsisset.” Liv. i. 34. Vir dicit; femina ducitur, seu nubitur. Tertullian, therefore, is chargeable with error, when he says, speaking of persons in heaven, Neque nubent, neque nubentur, instead of “Nec viri ducent uxores, nec feminæ nubent,” or, more concisely, “Nec connubia conjungentur.”

EXERCISE.

Marcia, the daughter of Cato, when she was lamenting her deceased husband, being asked, what was to be the last day of her grief, replied, that the last day of her life would be the last day of her grief. And Valeria, the sister of the Messalæ, being asked, why she would marry no one, her husband Servius being dead, answered, “My husband Servius always lives to me.” The wife of Phocion said to a lady, who was ostentatiously shewing her all her jewels, “My greatest ornament is Phocion, a poor man, indeed, but now twenty years general of the Athenians.”

OBSERVATIONS.

OBSIDERE. OPPUGNARE. EXPUGNARE. CAPERE.

Obsidere, is “to besiege,” or “blockade.” Oppugnare, “to attack,” or “assault.” Expugnare, “to storm,” or “take by assault.” Capere, “to take in any way, whether by force or stratagem.” “Obsidere circumsistere significat, oclusum tenere, ac vallo et fossa septum retinere. Inter obsidere et oppugnare hæc est differentia, quod illud fit mora, hoc impetu.” Steph. “Obsidere, oppugnare, et labefactare urbem aliquam.” Cic. de Arusp. Resp. 6. “Consiliis ab oppugnanda urbe ad obsidendum versis.” Liv. ii. 11.

Expugnare est pugnando capere. “Primum ædes expugnabo.” Ter. Eun. iv. 7. 3.

Sometimes, though very rarely, we find it used to denote the taking of a town without fighting, or the force of arms—thus, “Sedendoque expugnaturum se urbem spem habebat.” Liv. lib. ii. 12.

To Deliver.

When this verb signifies “to free,” it is rendered by liberare; when it denotes “to give up,” by tradere.

The junior reader has been already cautioned against making one substantive govern another in the genitive, except in those cases, in which the expression involves the English genitive, or may be changed into that genitive, thus, “The love of God,” or “God’s love,” Amor Dei. “The law of nature,” or “Nature’s law,” Lex naturæ.—By observing this rule, he will not be liable to error; and attention, while he reads the Classics, will soon teach him the admissible deviations from it.—One of the most common of these, as has been already observed, is, when the latter substantive has an adjective joined to it, modifying the quality or property as belonging to the former, thus, “A man of great wisdom,” Vir summæ prudentiæ, or summa prudentia. In these cases the expression cannot be turned into the English genitive; the latter substantive in Latin is, notwithstanding, put in the genitive, and also in the ablative. Vossius and Despauter remark, that a few examples occur, in which the latter substantive is put in the genitive, without any adjective joined to it—and they give each of them the following passage from Cicero, as an example, “Nunquid hi quos protulit, ante fuerunt aut opinionis aut gloriæ.” Cic. in Sall. The accuracy, however, of this reading, is questionable. Lambinus has it, much more consistently with the phraseology of Cicero, “ullius opinionis aut gloriæ,” where the term ullius evidently modifies the following substantive. The examples, indeed, where the latter substantive is put in the genitive, without an adjective joined to it, are in the best writers very few, if there be any. The scholar, therefore, should avoid this phraseology, and, instead of saying, “A man of prudence," Vir prudentiae, say, Vir prudens; "A man of courage," not Vir fortitudinis, but Vir fortis.

EXERCISE.

When king Porsena was besieging Rome, and thought that he should soon take the city, C. Mucius, a youth of daring spirit, determined to introduce himself into the camp of the enemy, and to slay the king. Fearing, however, lest, if he should go without the order of the consuls, he might be reckoned a deserter, he went to the senate, and spoke thus, "I intend, O fathers, to cross the Tiber; and, if I can, to enter the camp of the enemy, not, however, as a plunderer, but as the deliverer of my country. Plunder is not in my thoughts; if the Gods assist me, I meditate greater things."

OBSERVATIONS.

Uter means "which of two," quis, "who," or "which of many," as "Uter dignior, quis dignissimus." Quint. Among the poets, quis is sometimes used for uter, as,

"De Jove quid sentis? Estne, ut praeponere cures Hunc cuiquam? Cuinam? Vis Staio? an scilicet haeres, Quis potior judex, puerisve quis aptior orbis?"

Pers. Sat. ii. 18.

that is, "which of the two is the better judge."

AD.	PRO.	OB.	PROPTER.
-----	------	-----	----------

Ob means "for," or "on account of," as quam ob rem, "wherefore," "for," or "on account of what thing."—"Ob delictum poenas Di expetunt," Cic.

pro Marcel.—that is, “for,” or “on account of the trespass.”—Propter has the same meaning.—It may preclude a difficulty, if we here remark, that ob and propter are often suppressed. “Quid tristis es?” i. e. ob quid. “Id operam do.” Ter. i. e. ob id. “Hic eam rem volt, scio, mecum adire ad pactionem.” Plaut. Ob eam rem. “Ea te demoritur.” Plaut. i. e. propter te.

Pro signifies “for,” or “instead of,” “in exchange for,” “in defence of,” “in proportion to,” as “Hostis pro hospite.” Liv. i. 58, “An enemy instead of a friend.”—“Mori pro patria.” Hor. “In defence of one’s country.”—“Pro multitudine autem hominum angustos se fines habere arbitrabantur.” Cæs. B. G. i. 2, “Narrow territories for the population,” or “in proportion to the population.”

Ad means “for” or “for the purpose of,” as Ad id, “for that purpose.”—“Pisces ad cœnam empti,” “For the purpose of supper.”—“Argentum dabitur ei ad nuptias.” Ter. Heaut. iv. 5. 29, “For the wedding.”

The termination ing implies, as has been already observed, the imperfection of the action or state of being, and is either active or passive.

EXERCISE.

The fathers approve the design; and he accordingly sets out, with a sword concealed under his garment. When he came into the camp of the enemy, he posted himself in the thickest part of the crowd, near the king’s tribunal. It happened, that pay was at that time giving to the soldiers; and they were going up to the secretary to receive it, who was sitting beside the king, nearly in the same dress. Fearing to ask, which of the two was the monarch, lest he might discover himself to be a Roman, he killed the secretary instead of Porsena.

OBSERVATIONS.

AD.	ANTE.	CORAM.	PRÆ.
-----	-------	--------	------

Ante means “before,” not “after,” or “behind,” in respect to time or place ; and is opposed to Post; as Ante fores, “ Before the door,” “ not behind.”—Ante horam tertiam, “ Before ten o’clock,” opposed to Post horam tertiam, “ After ten o’clock.”

Coram means “before,” or “in the presence of,” and is nearly synonymous with In conspectu, In præsentia, Illo præsente, as, Coram prætore verba feci, “ I spoke before,” or “ in presence of, the Pretor.”

Ad means “before,” or “to,” as “ he was taken before the king.” Ad regem ductus est, that is, “ conducted to the king.”—“ They dragged him before the Pretor,” Ad prætorem traxerunt. Ante would imply, “ before,” and “ not behind,” the Pretor. Coram prætore would mean, “ in presence of the Pretor,” but not “ into the presence.” Præ, says Dr. Hill, expresses the relation, which one or more persons moving, bear to others following in the same path, “ I præ, sequar.” Ter. Ante, he observes, is applicable both to animate and inanimate objects ; Præ, to those only which are animate, or supposed to be such, or such objects, as have motion communicated by the person expressed by the correlative term. “Prae se armentum agens nando trajeccerat.” Liv. i. 7. “Prae se pugionem tulit.” Cic. According to the same author, it always denotes nearness, and thereby shews its connection with pro. This explanation I conceive to be neither quite correct, nor sufficiently precise. The preposition præ is by no means confined to animate objects, or to the relation, which one or more persons moving bear to others following them. When it either denotes the cause, being synonymous with ob or propter, or when it means, “In comparison with,” we find it often applied to things inanimate. Thus, “Prae ira,” Liv. xxxi. 24. “For, or through, anger.” “Prae formidine.” Ter. Eun. i. 2. 18. “For, or through, fear.” “Prae divitiis.” Liv. iii. 26. “In comparison with riches.” “Prae meo commodo.” Ter. Adelph. ii. 3. 9.

“Unum illud tibi, nate Dea, præque omnibus unum Prædicam.”

Virg. En. iii. 435.

In none of these examples is præ joined with an animate object, or an object in motion. The learned critic, therefore, does not appear to me to have correctly explained the distinction between ante and præ, a distinction, which, had not the etymology of the latter preposition escaped his observation, must have been sufficiently evident. The preposition præ is clearly an abbreviation of the Greek παραὶ, præter vel juxta, and therefore denotes propinquity. This relation we find uniformly expressed by it, in every form, in which it occurs, simple or compounded, ante denoting “before, at any distance,” præ “immediately before.” Thus, I præ, sequar. Ter. And. i. 1. 144. Præ se ferre, Præ se gerere, Præ se agere. The expression also Præire verba (verba pronunciare mox alii recitanda) and its meaning in the compounds prægustare, prælibare, præsidere, præsentire, præcipitare, metaphorically understood, conveys the same idea. Hence, also, it denotes “in comparison with,” things in juxta position being most easily compared. The only precise and uniform characteristic of præ appears, therefore, to be, that it expresses proximity, an idea by no means necessarily annexed to the term ante. It is applied, as we have seen, to animate and inanimate objects, either in motion or at rest. It agrees with pro, signifying “before,” as denoting propinquity; and differs from it in this, that while præ, in this sense, is not applied to material objects, pro is uniformly confined to them. “Quod ni maturasset pro curia signum sociis dare,” Sall. B. C. cap. 18. “immediately in front of the senate-house.” “Pro æde Jovis Statoris.” Cic. 2 Phil. In these examples præ would be inadmissible; and ante would not imply proximity.

I am aware of one passage, and only one, which may possibly be opposed to this explanation. “Arma ante januam projecerunt, ac præ foribus stantes intromitti orabant." But the expression occurs in a passage, which, independently on positive proof, bears internal evidence that it is not the production of Curtius. Præ is here improperly joined with a physical object, instead of pro.

It is common in English to employ the preposition of with a numeral adjective, obliquely referring the number specified to the class to which they belong, and also to make the numeral adjective the nominative to the verb, even when the subjects are the persons addressed, or make a common subject with the person, who speaks. The Latin idiom is different. We say, "Three youths of us met yesterday," or "Three of us youths met." The Latins, Tres adolescentuli heri coiimus, literally, "We three youths met."—"Four of you friends have heard," four being the number addressed, Quatuor amici adivis-tis, literally, "Ye four friends have heard."—The English idiom marks the number as part of a whole, and distinguishes the persons speaking, from the persons addressed, and both from the persons spoken of, by subjoining the appropriate pronoun, thus, "Three youths of us (youths)."—The Latins do not express, whether the number be the whole, or a part of the class to which they belong; but consider it as necessary to note them distinctly, by the person of the verb, as either the persons addressed, the persons spoken of, or the persons included with the speaker himself. The same difference of idiom obtains, where the number is indefinite, or uncertain. "How many are there of us?"—" How few of you there are?"

Quot sumus? Quam pauci estis?

The reader will remember, that when the preposition with implies concomitancy, or that one person accompanies another, the preposition cum must be used, as "Cum legionibus tribus prosectorum est." Cæs. "He set out with," or "along with, three legions." We have now to observe, that even with the instrument, which is otherwise put in the ablative, without the preposition, the word cum is employed, when concomitancy is signified, as "Ingressus est cum gladio," "He entered with a sword," or "having a sword with him."—"Cum faleibus multi purgantur, et aperuerunt locum." Cic. Tusc. Quæst. "Many armed with hooks," or "having hooks with them, cleared and opened the place." Were the preposition omitted, the idea would be somewhat different; and the meaning would be, that they cleared the place by, "by means of," or "by the instrumentality of, hooks."

EXERCISE.

When he was making his way through the trembling crowd, with a bloody sword, he was seized by the king's life guards, and brought before the tribunal. Fearing nothing, he said, "I am a Roman citizen; they call me C. Mucius. I, an enemy, wished to kill an enemy; nor is my mind less prepared for bearing death, than it was for taking away your life. To do and to suffer brave things is the property of a Roman. Three hundred youths of us have conspired against you; it behoves you, therefore, to prepare yourself."

OBSERVATIONS.

VIDERE.	SPECTARE.	INTUERI.	ASPICERE.
ANIMADVERTERE.		CERNERE.

Aspicere est intendere aut adjicere oculos ad aliquid, aut aliquò. Cernere est videre aut intueri, quò conjecteris oculos. “Ut possit is illa omnia cernere, qui tantum modo aspicerit.” Cic. (Verw. Thes. in Vavass.) Fronto thus distinguishes them, “Videmus natura—Spectamus voluntate—Intuemur cura—Aspicimus negligenter, et improviso—Animadvertemus animo—Cernimus oculis. More accurately, perhaps, they may be distinguished thus, Videre is simply, “to see,” Aspicere is “to behold,” or “look at,” whether by accident, or intentionally. “Vix aspiciendi fuit potestas.” Cic. de Orat. i. 161. “Forte unam aspicio adolescentulam.” Ter. And. i. 1. 91. Intueri is “to look at designedly and carefully,”—“to gaze upon.” Cominus inspicere, (Steph.) as, “Terram intuens modeste.” Ter. Eun. iii. 5. 32. “Intueri et contemplari aliquem.” Cic. pro Planc. “Acrioribus oculis aliquid intueri.” Quint. ii. 20. Spectare, “to view,” or “look at steadily or often;” “Sosia age, me huc aspice. Sos. Specto.” Plaut. Amph. i. 2. 118. “Siderum motus scite spectare dicuntur.” Q. Curt. iii. 9. Animadvertere, “to notice,” “to perceive,” opposed to, “to overlook,” or “not to observe.” “Nostros lacessere cœperunt. Postquam id animadvertisit Cæsar.” Cæs. i. 24. It frequently, however, signifies also, “purposely to direct the attention of the mind to any object.”—“Non enim pro tua prudentia debes illud solum animadvertere.” Cic. Cernere is “to see clearly,” so as to be able to discriminate, or judge, whether by the eye, or by the mind. It is evidently, by metathesis, the Greek verb κρίνω, separo, secerno, and its original signification, as Hill observes, was “to sift or separate the flour from the bran.”—“Per cribrum minutissime cernere.” Cat. R. R. cvii. 1. In the following passage, its meaning, as opposed to videre, is well illustrated. “Nos enim ne nunc quidem oculis cernimus ea, quæ videmus.” Cic. Q. Tusc. i. 20. It sometimes also denotes, “to perceive clearly by the sense of hearing,” Vox illius est certe, idem omnes cernimus. (Nonius.)

VIRTUS.

FORTITUDO.

AUDACIA.

Virtus is thus defined by Cicero. “Virtus nihil aliud est, quam in se perfecta et ad summum perducta natura.” Cic. de Leg. 1. “Virtus rationis est absolutio.” Id. de Fin. 5. “Rationis perfectio est virtus.” Id. de Fin. 4. Fortitudo he defines thus, “Fortitudo est considerata periculorum susceptio et laborum perpessio;” and also, “Animi affectio cum in adeundo periculo, tum in labore et dolore patiendo, procul ab omni metu.” Tusc. Quæs. 5. Thus virtus is a generic term denoting the force and vigour of the mind, as exerted in the practice of every virtue, whether of an active, or passive, nature. It is, accordingly, sometimes opposed to mere strength of body. “Sed diu inter mortales certamen fuit, vinc corporis, an virtute animi, res militaris magis procederet.” Sall. It is sometimes used in a more extensive sense, denoting power, excellence, or value in general. “Atque in sensibus est sua cuique virtus.” Cic. de Fin. “Virtutes rei.” Quint. “Mercis virtus (quod valet, vel bonitas). Plaut. Mil. iii. 1. 132. It is sometimes even applied to the brute creation. “Etiam fera animalia, si clausa teneas, virtutis obliviscuntur.” Tac. Hist. iv. 64.—“Est in equis patrum virtus.” Hor. Carm. iv. 4. 30, and sometimes also to the vegetable creation. This application, however, is considered by Cicero to be an abuse of the word. “Nam nec arboris, nec equi virtus, quæ dicitur, in quo abutimur nomine,” &c. Cic. de Leg. 1. In its limited and special sense it is used for fortitudo, “courage,” because, as Cicero observes, “Viri maxime propria est fortitudo,” in the same manner as ἀνδρεία, from ἀνήρ, denotes “courage.” Fortitudo and virtus, as used in this sense, are distinguished from audacia by this circumstance, that they imply a virtue of the mind—a rational principle, in which they originate, and by which they are governed. Audacia, in general, as Hill justly observes, implies a defect. It is, as he says, a constitutional boldness, without any regard to the value of the object. “Audacia temeritatis est,” says Nonius. “Imitatur audacia fortitudinem,” is the observation of Cicero. And when he quotes, with approbation, a saying of Plato, he gives it in these words, “ Non solum, inquit scientia, quæ est remota a justitia, calliditas potius, quam sapientia, est appellanda, verum etiam animus paratus ad periculum, si sua cupiditate, non utilitate communi impellitur, audaciæ potius, nomen habeat, quam fortitudinis.” Cic. de Off. 2. Sallust opposes it to virtus. “ Pro virtute audacia vigebat.” B. C.—and Cato, in his speech, complains that it had usurped the name of courage. “ Vera rerum vocabula amisimus, quia malarum rerum audacia fortitudo vocatur.” Id. It is sometimes, however, used in a favourable sense, and by no writer, as far as I have observed, so frequently as by Sallust. “ Duabus his artibus, audacia in bello, ubi pax evenerat, æquitate, seque remque publicam curabant.” Id. “ Audacia pro muro habetur.” Id. “ Quanta cujusque animo audacia natura aut moribus inest, tanta in bello patere solet.” Id. Here audacia is put for courage, whether implanted by nature, or imparted by education.

EXERCISE.

When the king, enraged and terrified, was ordering him to be burned, unless he should quickly disclose the plot of the Roman youths; Mucius thrust his hand into a pan of coals, and said, “ Behold how contemptible is the body to those, who have glory in view!” When he was holding his hand in the fire, seemingly without any sense of pain, the king, amazed at his fortitude, sprung from his seat, and ordered him to be set at liberty. Next day he sent ambassadors to Rome, to offer terms of peace.

OBSERVATIONS.

MAGNUS.

AMPLUS.

INGENS.

Magnus means “Great in general;” and is opposed to Parus, denoting “Littleness in general;” as “Magna Dii curant, parva negligunt.” It is applied figuratively to things immaterial, as “Magnum ingenium.” Cic. “Animus magnus.” Id. and is to be considered as the generic term to express “Great.” It may be necessary, however, to caution the young reader against applying it to a person, to denote “great in stature, or size.” “Vir magnus,” signifies “A man great in mind;” “great by his virtues;” “great by his achievements.” (Scheller, vol. i. p. 71.)

Amplus means “Spacious,” or, as Doletus defines it, Quod late patet, referring to its limits or extent. “It denotes,” says Hill, “that greatness, which consists in superficial capacity.” This, certainly, is its true meaning. “Theatrum amplitudine amplum.” Cic. ad Quint. “Gymnasium amplissimum.” Id. in Verr. It is used figuratively, to denote “Great in rank, or character,” as Homines ampli, “Great men,” “Men eminent for rank or virtue.”

Of this word, various etymologies have been proposed by different critics, some regarding it as compounded of ἀνὰ et πλέος, plenus—others of ἀνὰ et πλωῦς, navigatio—and some of ἀμφὶ et πλωῦς. Were we to offer a hasty conjecture on the subject, we should be inclined to suggest, that it is derived from ἀναπλόω, Expando, and that ἀπλοῦς, διπλοῦς, Amplus (anaplus) Duplus, &c. are all members of the same family.

Ingens, “Huge,” rises in signification above Magnus. “Ingens,” says Doletus, “est maximus, et summus.” Thr. “Magnas vero agere gratias Thais mihi?” Gn. “Ingentes.” Ter. Eun. iii. 1. 1.

Grandis seems to hold a middle rank between Magnus and Ingens. It is properly defined to be “Quod magnum incrementum habet.” (See Nolt. Lex. Ant.) or “Magnum incremento,” “Great by increase.”—“Grandem pecuniam credere.” Cic.—“Grande pondus auri.” Id. Donatus affirms, that the ancients applied the word to the age, and not to the size, or the person, of the subject; and most critics and lexicographers have adopted this opinion. Noltenius, however, scruples not to ridicule such an idea. “Donatus,” says the learned critic, “fumum nobis vendit, quum assertum it, ‘Grandem ad ætatem veteres retulisse, non ad corpus.’” In confirmation of his opinion, he quotes the two following passages,

“Grandior ut foetus siliquis fallacibus esset.”

Virg. Geo. i.

“Grandiores victimæ.” Plin. Paneg. cap. 52. Grangæus adopts the same opinion with Noltenius; for, in his note on the following passage from Juvenal, —“Metuens virgæ, jam grandis Achilles, Cantabat patriis in montibus;” Sat. vii. 210.

he says, that the adjective must refer to the person, and not the years, of Achilles ; for, that the hero left his native country, before he was nine years of age, and went to the court of Lycomedes. The argument here is inconclusive ; for, unless we are to suppose, that his years and his growth did not mutually keep pace, it must be evident, that if Grandis be applicable to him in respect to his person or size, it must be equally so, in regard to his years ; and that if it be not applicable to his years, it is alike inapplicable to his person. The fact seems to be, that Magnus and Grandis each refer to size, and that it is either by ellipsis, or by inference, that they denote “age.” Hence we find them frequently joined with Ætas and Ævum, two adjuncts completely redundant, if the terms themselves expressed the age. But as years and growth keep mutual pace to a certain term, an advance in stature is employed to express an increase of age. Hence, in Greek, the term ἡλικία means either “stature,” or “age.” (See Luke, xii. 25.) But though Grandis strictly refers to size, and only by inference denotes “age,” yet I am inclined to think, with Donatus, that when the human species is the subject, it refers to years, and not to stature.

Though Grandis generally relates to an advanced period of life, or, at any rate, to perfect manhood, it is applicable to the completion of the different stages of human existence. Thus, we say, “Grandis infans ;” “Grandis puer ;” “Grandis ephebus ;” “Grandis virgo.”

Vacare is thus construed. In its absolute sense, it is equivalent to Otium habere. “Scribes aliquid, si vacabis.” Vacare philosophiae, that is, “Operam dare, “To give attention, or application.” Vacare culpa, “To be free from fault.” Vacat locus, “The place is empty.” Vacat mihi audire verba tua, “I am at leisure to hear your words.”

“An uncle by the father’s side,” is rendered by Patruus, and “by the mother’s,” by Avunculus. In the following exercise, the latter is to be used.

Deficere is construed thus, Deficit mihi, i. e. Deest mihi. Deficit me, i. e. Destituit me. Deficiere ab aliquo, i. e. Desciscere ab aliquo. Scioppius has objected to the expression Defectus viribus, for “His strength failing him.” It is true, I believe, that the participle of this passive verb, joined with an ablative, is not found in any prose writer of the golden age, but it occurs frequently in the poets; and we find the verb so construed in the indicative, subjunctive, and infinitive moods, in Cicero and Cæsar; thus, “Mulier consilio, et ratione deficitur.” Cic. pro Cluen. “In eo prælio—cum aquilifer viribus deficeretur.” Cæs. B. C. lib. iii. It would be fastidious, therefore, to reject the expression, sanctioned as it is, not only by strict analogy, but also by poetic usage, and all the writers of the silver age. The scholar may, therefore, consider himself justified in saying, either Consilio, ingenio defectus, or Consilio, ingenio deficiente.

EXERCISE.

Aleibiades, when he was yet a boy, called one day on his uncle Pericles, and found him sitting by himself, thoughtful and sad. The boy asked him the cause. “ I have,” replied Pericles, “ by an order of the city, erected the porch of Minerva’s temple ; and having expended a vast sum of money on the work, I know not how to give in my account.” “ Contrive, rather,” said Alcibiades, very promptly, “ how you may not give it in.” Accordingly, this sagacious and eminent man followed the advice of the boy, and so managed the matter, that the Athenians being involved in a war with their neighbours, had no leisure to call for accounts.

OBSERVATIONS.

Nequis is elegantly used for Ut nemo, as “ He gave orders, that no man should leave the camp,” Imperavit, ut nemo castris exiret,—elegantly, Nequis castris exiret. “ Et jure jurando, nequis enunciaret, inter se sanxerunt.” Cæs. B. G. i. 30. “ Ponere leges, nequis fur esset.” Hor. Sat. i. 3. 105, “ That no man should be a thief.”

IMPERARE.

PRÆESSE.

Imperare denotes, “ to have the command of,” or “ to have authority over,” and also, “ to give an order or a command,” as invested with that authority. Præesse is merely “ to be the chief,” or “ to have the command of,” but is not used to denote any particular order, or act of authority. “ Hæc ut im-peret illi parti animi, quæ obediens debet, id videndum est viro." Cic. Tusc. Quæst. ii. 47. Here the habitual exercise of authority or control is implied. "Non imperabat coram, quid facto opus esset puerperæ." Ter. And. iii. 2. 10. Here an act simply is expressed. Præesse exercitui, is "to have the command of an army." Imperare exercitui, is "to have the command of an army," and also, "to give orders to an army."

EXERCISE.

When the Romans were carrying on war against the Latins and the Tusculans, the consuls, T. M. Torquatus and P. Decius, published an edict, that no one should fight with the enemy without their order. It happened, that among the other captains of companies, who had been sent to different parts, to explore the situation of the enemy, T. Manlius, son of the consul, came near the post of the Tusculan cavalry, which Metius, a man illustrious for his birth and his exploits, commanded. When he saw the Roman horse, and the son of the consul marching before them, he instantly rode up to them, and challenged Manlius to single combat.

OBSERVATIONS.

ADOLESCENS.

JUVENIS.

Adolescens properly means, "one growing to maturity." Juvenis, "a person grown up," or "one arrived at maturity."—"Juvenis," says Schorus, "Latine non dicitur de prima ætate, sed adulta potius." Verw. Thes. The successive gradations of age are expressed by infantulus, infans, puerulus, puer, adolescentulus, adolescens, junior, juvenis, senior, senex. Respecting the precise periods, at which the terms puer, adolescens, juvenis, and senex, were applied by the Romans, various opinions have been entertained. Some have divided human life into periods of fifteen years each, and give it as their opinion, that till the age of fifteen the term puer was applied—from fifteen to thirty, adolescens—from thirty to forty-five, juvenis—and from forty-five, senex. This opinion, however, is chiefly conjectural. The reader will find much information on this subject, by consulting H. Steph. Schediasm. lib. iv. 21, 22.

Vavassor justly observes, that adolescentia is confined to one particular period of life, like the term pueritia; but that juventus is often used generally, so as to include the periods marked by pueritia and adolescentia. “Legendus est hic orator, si quisquam aliis, juventuti.” Cic. de Cl. Or.—that is, pueris, adolescentibus, junioribus.

It is necessary here to guard the young scholar against an impropriety, not uncommon in modern Latin. C. Stephans, in the very beginning of his Dictionary, uses the following expression, “Remensem adolescentiam,” and also, Adr. Turnebus, “Ad inducendam adolescentiam comparata est.” Now it is to be observed, that classic writers never employ adolescentia, which signifies “youth,” or “the season of youth,” to denote “youth,” or “young men,” though juventus is often used by them in this sense; thus, Trojana juvenus, that is, Trojani juvenes et adolescentes; but we cannot say, Trojana adolescētia, to denote “ Trojan youths.”

It deserves the attention of the reader, that when the relative clause is not restrictive of the antecedent, the relative may be resolved into Et is, or Et ille. Thus, “ Discontent is an evil, which poisons human life,” or “ Discontent is an evil, and it poisons human life.” When no particular stress is to be laid on the relative clause, the combination of the conjunction and demonstrative pronoun, in the relative qui, is to be considered as preferable, and is by classic writers generally adopted. Thus, “ A friend was then at my house, and he told me so,” Amicus, qui tum apud me erat, mihi ita dixit. “ I asked him this question ; and when he did not answer, I refused to do it,” Hoc ex eo quæsivi ; qui cum non respondisset facere nolui—better than, Et cum ille.—Pater mortuus est ; et cum eum sepelire vellem—better, quem cum sepelire vellem. Qui is used also for Et ego, Et tu; thus, “ You reminded me of my danger, and if I had followed your advice, I should now be in a better situation,” De periculo me commonefecisti, cuius consilio si paruissem, meæ res sese melius haberent; (Cic.) better than, Si tuo consilio paruissem. “ Posteaquam mihi renunciatum est, de obitu Tulliæ filiæ tuæ —graviter molesteque tuli, communemque eam calamitatem existimavi ; qui si adfuissem,” &c. (Cic.) that is, *et si ego adfuissem.

* It is somewhat surprising, that Harris did not perceive, that qui is not always resolvable into et ille, and that the relative

EXERCISE.

The courage of the youth was roused by this challenge ; and, forgetting his father's command, he rushed to the contest. At the first onset, he dismounted the Tusculan, and stabbed him through the heart. He then returned to his father, with the spoils of his enemy. "Challenged," said he, "by a Tusculan, I slew him, and have brought you the spoils." The father ordered the soldiers to be assembled, and, in their hearing, addressed his son thus : "Titus Manlius, you have slighted the consular authority ; you have fought contrary to orders ; and if others should imitate your example, the Roman state would soon be ruined. In order, therefore, that the republic may sustain no injury from your conduct, you must be punished capitally for your offence." The gallant youth accordingly suffered death for his excessive bravery.

OBSERVATIONS.

CARBO.

PRUNA.

Pruna means "a live coal," or "burning coal;" carbo, "charcoal," whether alive or dead. "Subjiciunt verubus prunas et viscera torrent." Virg. Aen. v. 103. "Nunquam ad flammam ungi oportet, interdum ad prunam." Cels.

"Tam excoctam reddam atque atram, quam carbo est." Ter. Adelph. v. 3. 63. "Creta an carbone notandi." Hor. Sat. lib. ii. 3. 246. "Rubrica picta, is not uniformly both a substitute and a connective. In one of his own examples, the relative is evidently not resolvable into et ille.

"Qui metuens vivit, liber mihi non erit unquam,"

Hor. Ep. i. 16. 66.

an carbone." Id. Sat. lib. ii. 8, 98. In these examples, carbo denotes "charcoal," or a substance once ignited or red hot, and now a dead coal. It is sometimes used for the same substance, again alive, or in a state of ignition: as, "Lentis carbonibus ure." Ov. Trist. iii. 11. 47. "Cultros metuens tonsorios candente carbone sibi adurebat capillum." Cic. Off. ii. 25. "Cum carbo vehementer perlucet." Plin. 18.

The distinction given by Servius between carbo and pruna, is this, "Carbo et pruna differunt quod pruna dicatur quamdiu ardet—carbo quum extineta est." Noltenius adopts the same distinction, "Pruna cremat." Nolt. p. 391. And he observes, that when carbo stands by itself it means "a dead coal." Nolt. Lex. Antibarb. p. 860. The example from Pliny proves this to be not universally true.

CÆDERE. SCINDERE. SECARE. RESECARE.

Cædere, according to Dumesnil, signifies "to strike," "cut," or "divide in pieces," as "Januam cædere saxis." Cic. "Virgis ad necem cædi." Id. Cædere, he observes, when we speak of stones, signifies "to cut them from quarries." Secare is "to cut them for the purpose of any building or work." "Marmora secanda locas." Hor. Resecare is "to retrench," "lop off," or "pare by cutting."—"Resecare linguam, palpebras." Cic. Scindere, "to cut," implies an effort, or the exertion of strength—and by this chiefly is distinguished from findere. Of the distinction between these verbs and scindere, he has said nothing.

Scindere, according to Hill, signifies the violent separation of the parts of a substance, by the use of any instrument, fitted to effect it. He adds, “that in this operation the impelling force may, or may not, be exerted by human strength; and that the instrument may, or may not, act by means of an edge.”

Cædere, he says, “implies, that the separation is always made by the edge of that which effects it, whether blunt or otherwise; and that the cut is made by the severity of the blow.”

Secare signifies “the act of separating by means of the sharpness of an instrument: differing from cædere in not requiring a severe blow,” and “from scindere in supposing it effected by dint of sharpness.” This explanation is more precise than Dumesnil’s; but appears to me to be somewhat incorrect.

Scindere is “to rend,” “tear,” or “separate the parts forcibly by any means whatever,” as Penulum scindere, “To tear, or rend, a cloak.” Cic. Epistolam scindere, Cic. “To tear or rend, a letter.” Scindere rela, “To split or rend the sails.” Plaut. Trin. iv. 1. 18. Mordicibus scindere (Plaut. Aul. ii. 2. 57.) “To tear with the teeth.” Sentes scindunt (Id. Cas. iii. 6. 2.) “The brambles tear.”

Cædere is to “strike,” “beat,” or “cut,” and while it implies a blow or stroke inflicted or given, whether with an edged instrument or not, always signifies at the same time the action of an animate being.

Scindere is applied also to the agency of mere physical force.

Secare always implies sharpness in the instrument, and generally some degree of care or nicety in the operation. Hence it is applied to surgical operations, as “Cum varices secabantur C. Mario, dolebat.” Cic. Tusc. Quæst. ii. 2.; to reaping or mowing, “Pūbentesque secant herbas.” Virg. Geo. iii. 126. It is also used to denote generally, “to pass through, or divide,” as “Limes, qui ita secabat agrum, decumanus vocabatur.” Plin. xviii. 34.

Cædere differs, it would appear, from scindere in these particulars:—1st. Scindere denotes force or violence; cædere does not imply a severity of blow, or any considerable effort. This is evident from the expression “cædere ferula,” Hor. 1 Sat. iii. 120, “cædere femur,” “pectus,” “frontem.” Quint. lib. ii. cap. 12, and several others which might be quoted.

2dly. Scindere necessarily implies a separation of the parts, “a cutting,” or “sundering:” Cædere does not; or when this separation is implied, it is rather by inference, than the strict import of the word. This is evident from the examples which have been just now adduced. When Quintilian speaks of orators striking their forehead, their thigh, or their breast, he does not mean to signify, that they inflict on themselves any wound, or severe blow, so as to produce a separation of the parts. And when Persius says, it is not to be understood, that the blow separates the parts of the desk. Nor is this necessarily implied in the expressions Pugnis cædere, Loris cædere.

“Nec pluteum cædit, nec demorsos sapit unguis,” Sat. i. 106.

3dly. Cædere implies the action of an animate being; scindere is applicable to things animate and inanimate. In consistency with this opinion, Valla defines cædes to be “Mors non fatalis, sed ferro, aut ligno, aut saxo, similibusque illata, præsertim occidere, aut ferire, aut percutere, volentis.” By metaphor it is sometimes employed to express the inflictions of a guilty conscience, as

—“Quos diri conscientia facti Mens habet attonitos, et surdo verbere cædit.”

Juv. Sat. xiii. 194.

It is to be observed, that in such expressions as these, “On the day before he came,”—“On the day after he came,” instead of saying, Die antequam venit, or Die postquam venit, we elegantly say, Pridie quam venit, that is, Die priore quam venit, and Posttridie quam venit, that is, Die posteriore quam venit. It may be here also remarked, that antequam and postquam are sometimes divided, each into its component parts, placed in different clauses, the preposition governing its proper case. Thus, instead of saying, Anno et quatuor mensibus, antequam decederet, we may say, “Ante annum, et quatuor menses, quam decederet.” Suet. in Cæs. Aug. cap. 50, either Quarto anno postquam redierit, or with Nepos “Quartum post annum quam redierit.” Vit. Dionis.

The effect, or purpose, instead of being expressed by ut or ad, is elegantly expressed by the relative pronoun: thus, “He asked for water, to allay his thirst.” Aquam petivit, qua sitim leniret, “with which he might allay.”

EXERCISE.

When Poreia, the daughter of Cato of Utica, heard that her husband Brutus had been conquered and slain at Philippi, she called for a sword to kill herself. This not being given her, she took some burning char-coals, and swallowed them. Before this time, indeed, she had disciplined herself for enduring the pain of death with fortitude. The day before Cæsar was slain by the conspirators, she called for a razor, as if to pare her nails, and having received it, she wounded herself severely with it, as if it had accidentally slipped from her hand.

OBSERVATIONS.

ANCILLA.

FAMULA.

Ancilla, says Dumesnil, is “A maid-servant and slave.” Famula, “A maid-servant, but free.” That Ancilla was “A maid-servant” in the lowest condition, we learn from Martial, who, in stating his preferences according to the several ranks of females, says, “Extrema est ancilla loco.” Ep. iii. 33.

Ancilla and Serva are, in a variety of cases, used as synonymous, or as denoting each “a female servant in a state of slavery.” That Famula may sometimes imply "a female servant in a state of freedom," cannot be questioned; but that this is its only proper signification, appears improbable, for these reasons:

1st. If the derivation of Famulus or Famula, be from Famel, written by Ennius Famul, a word denoting, in the ancient language of Campania, as Holyoke informs us, "A slave," we may reasonably infer, that the primitive and leading idea is retained in the derivative term.

2dly. We find that the term Famula is applied to a person, whom we know to have been a slave, and to have been designated by the term Serva; and we find the same word used to denote "a female slave," assigned to another slave as his property,

"Me famulam, famuloque Heleno transmisit habendam."

Virg. Aen. iii. 329.

When Sisygambis, a captive, addresses Alexander, and says, "Ego me tuam famulam esse confiteor," Curt. iii. 12, she cannot be understood to signify, that she confessed herself to be in a state of freedom, or that she was to be regarded as one of his free attendants, or domestics.

In the following passage from Ovid, there can be no question, but the term Famulas alludes particularly to the slaves.

"Quæ Dea sit; quare famulas a limine templi Arceat."

Ov. Fast. vi. 481.

Again—We find that the Famulæ are frequently represented as compelled to the same labour with the Ancillæ.

“Aut hærent telæ, famulasque laboribus urgent.”

Ov. Met. iv. 35.

“Quinquaginta intus famulæ, quibus ordine longo Cura penum struere, et flaminis adolere penates.”

Virg. Aen. i. 707.

And when Horace uses the expression,

“Cum famulis operum solutis”

Hor. Car. iii. 17. 16.

he clearly includes all who served in the family.—This subject, however, will be resumed, when we come to consider the difference between Servus, Famulus, and Verna.

For is frequently, before a verb, expressed by quia, or quod, as “I care less for your having turned away the workmen,”—“Minus curo, quod operarios eje-cisti.” Cic. It has been given by Noltenius as a general rule, that, when the verb in the clause connected with quod is in the present tense, the particle takes the indicative, and when it is in a preterite tense, it takes the subjunctive mood. “Quod bene vales, gaudeo.” Cic. “Nulli places, quod tibi nimium places.” Id. “Quod redieris incolumis, gaudeo.” “Gratissimum est mihi, quod quiveris.” Cic. From this rule, however, if it is acknowledged to be general, the deviations are numerous. It is to be observed, at the same time, that when quod means “why” following a negative, it uniformly takes the subjunctive mood. In such examples it follows the rule, given for the relative pronoun, which will be explained hereafter. Nihil est, quod succenseas, Ter. “ There is no reason, why you should be angry.”

It may be useful to remind the junior reader, that to before a verb, and expressing “ purpose,” “ intention,” or “ effect,” must not be rendered by the infinitive, but by ad with the gerund, or ut with the subjunctive mood.

It likewise deserves his particular attention, that nouns, implying either action or passion, have an ambiguous signification, when governing other nouns in the genitive case. Thus, Amor Dei denotes either Amor, quo Deus amat, or quo Deus amatur. “ Injuria consulis.” Liv. xlvi. 1. “ The injury, which the consul did.” “ Injurias Æduorum.” Cæs. B. G. i. 35. “ The injuries, which the Ædui suffered.” Analogy, therefore, would lead us to infer, that, when such substantives are joined with a possessive adjective, they have either an active, or passive signification. Accordingly, we find this to be the case. It is to be observed, however, that when the signification is passive, classic writers, instead of employing the possessive adjective, generally use the genitive of the simple noun. This has been remarked by Despauter, by Ruddiman, and several other grammarians. Thus, Amor meus denotes, “ My love towards another,” i. e. Amor, quo amo: but Amor mei means, Quo amore amor, or “ The love, which another bears to me." "Desiderium sui reliquit apud populum." Cic. pro Rab.; desiderium, quo desiderabatur. "Mea lux, meum desiderium." Cic. Ep. Fam. 14, i. e. desiderium, quo desidero. "Magnis muneribus ad studium sui perdueit." Sall. B. J. cap. 80. i. e. quo sibi farebatur. "Polliceri, et profiteri suum eximium et singulare studium." Cic. Ep. Fam. v. 8. i. e. quo studebat. Examples occur of a contrary usage; but they are far less numerous. "Nam neque negligentia tua, neque odio id fecit tuo." Ter. Phor. v. 9.

27. Here the noun, joined with a possessive adjective, is used in a passive sense.

I am aware, that Drakenborch, in his note on Liv. xxx. 44, maintains the contrary doctrine, and contends, that odium vestrum should be rendered "hatred towards you." In this he errs. That the noun, joined to a possessive adjective, has sometimes a passive signification is admitted; but that this is uniformly true, we have ample authority for denying. The contrary usage, indeed, is far more general.

EXERCISE.

The maidservants immediately raised a cry, and Brutus came into the bedchamber to inquire the cause.—When he began to chide her, for thus doing the office of a barber, "I did not," said she, "inflict this wound by chance, but designedly; it is a sure evidence of my love towards you; for I wished to try, whether I had spirit enough to seek death by the sword, if your noble purpose should not turn out according to your wish." Brutus affectionately embraced her; then raising his hands to heaven, he fervently prayed, that the Gods would make him worthy of so excellent a wife.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPERE.

SUMERE.

ACCIPERE.

The two latter are thus distinguished by Popma, Fronto, and Noltenius. Sumimus quæ posita sunt : accipimus quæ porriguntur—thus, “Epistolam super caput temere positam sumit.” Cic. “Quod mihi a te datur, accipio.” Cic. “Ita sumimus ipsi ; accipimus ab alio quod datur, sive rem datam capiendo tollimus.” Sic quum damus, et de manu in manum tradimus, dicendum est accipe; quum permittimus alicui quippiam tollere, dicendum est, sume. The distinction between Capere and Sumere, is thus given by Hill. Capere, he says, supposes, that the agent of his own will, lays hold of an object, over which he has a certain power ; and the general idea suggested by the verb is founded upon a necessity, which sometimes operates upon that which is taken, and at others, upon the person, who takes, thus,

“ Hic jaculo pisces, illic capiuntur ab hamis.”

Ov. de Art. Am. i. 765.

Here the necessity lies on the things (pisces), which are taken ; while the power and right of the sportsman are also implied. “Desiderium quod capiebat ex filio.” Cic. de Sen. Here the necessity operates on the person taking.

Sumere excludes necessity, and denotes the act of taking that, which may, or may not, be the property of the person who does so, and involves no force, or coercion, in respect to the thing taken. The act likewise may depend on the will of the person taking, or on permission from others.

This explanation of the verbs sumere and capere, as implying or excluding a necessity, which operates sometimes on the thing taken, and sometimes on the person taking, appears much too vague to furnish any precise idea of the distinction. It would appear that the difference between capere and sumere is simply this, that the former implies the idea of power or ability, the latter of right or permission.—Capimus quod possumus; sumimus quod permittitur, vel quod positum est. I believe this distinction comprehends every point of difference.

When the Scythian orator said to Alexander, “Concupiscis, quæ non capis.” Curt. vii. 8, he meant to signify, that he coveted, what he could not take. The same idea is implied in Alexander’s observation concerning Parmenio, “Majora quam capit, spirat.” Curt. vi. 9. “Casus est,” says Cicero, “in capiendo, locus, eventus, occasio.” (Cic. pro Flacc.) signifying that the ability of taking depends on the three circumstances specified. I observe, also, that the intention generally implied by Capere is, “to hold,”—while that implied by Sumere is, “to use.” Hence capere frequently denotes to keep, or contain, and also to admit, as “Orbis te non caperet,” Curt. vii.

8, “The world would not contain you;”—and accordingly capax, the verbal adjective, signifies, “able to contain.” And as our power to take often depends on the inclination of others, capere is frequently used for accipere rem oblatam: as “Cape hoc argentum, et defer.” Ter. Heaut. iv. 7. 3. “Take,” or “receive.”

Sumere implies “permission,” and hence, “a right,” real, or conceived. It denotes “to take,” generally for the purpose of using. “Hoc mihi sumo,” Cic. in Verr. “I assume this as a right.” “Id mihi non sumo.” Id. “Quid ergo? hoc tibi sumis, ut quia tu defenderis, innocens judicetur?” Orat. pro Sylla. “Do you assume this as a right principle?” —“Id sumam,” Ter. Ph. iv. 3. 76. “I will take that for my use.” The idea of permission, or right, as involved in sumere, is clearly implied in the following passages: “Res non concessas sumere, et ex illis efficere quid velis.” Cic. de Fin. 4. “Sed quum bis sumpsit, quod vult, id tamen quod assumit, concedi nullo modo potest.” Cic. de Div. ii. 103. “Quis Antonio permisit, ut et partes faceret, et utram vellet, prior ipse sumeret.” Cic. de Orat.

Hence sumere sometimes denotes, “to borrow,” as “Sumeret alicunde.” Ter. Phor. i. 5. 70.

And as choice is equally compatible with the act of taking, whether that act be done by means of our own power, or by the permission of another, or as a matter of real or fancied right, so these two verbs are frequently used as equivalent to Eligere, “to choose," as, " Sumat aliquem ex populo, monitorem officii sui," Sall. B. J. cap. 85, Let him choose some person."

" Nunc terras ordine longo Aut capere, aut captas jam despectare videntur."

Virg. Æn. i. 399.

" They seem to choose, or pitch upon, a spot of ground."—" Ante locum capies oculis." Id. G. ii.

Before we leave this subject, it may be useful to observe, with Dumesnil, as a caution to the young scholar, that though we may say, Capere voluptatem, " To receive, or derive, pleasure," and also passively, Voluptate capi, " To be captivated with pleasure," we cannot say, Capi dolore, molestia, &c. though we may say actively, Dolor me cepit, " Grief seized me."

FORMA.

PULCHRITUDO.

Vavassor admits a difference between these two words; but confesses his ignorance of its precise nature. (See Verw. Thes. in Vav.)

Donatus says, " Forma est oris, et naturæ; figura artis; pulchritudo totius corporis."—" Forma," says Dumesnil, " is that, which determines the matter to be this thing or that; and results from the construction and arrangement of the parts." This he opposes to Figura. Pulchritudo, " beauty," he observes, is that property which strikes the eye. And he quotes Cicero as defining it, " Pulchritudo corporis apta compositione membrorum movet oculos." From this definition it would appear, that Pulchritudo regards merely the symmetry of the person, or just proportion of the members of the body; and, on this definition, the opinion of Donatus seems to have been founded. Others, on the contrary, suppose that Pulcher, derived from πολυχρόος, Multicolor, refers chiefly to that beauty, which consists in colour, and that Formosus, from Forma, regards chiefly the symmetry of the members. To this opinion, respecting the signification of Pulcher, or Pulchritudo, the passage quoted from Cicero presents, it would seem, an insuperable objection.

But we have fortunately another passage, in which the author completes his definition; for he says, “Quædam apta figura membrorum cum coloris quædam suavitate, ea dicitur pulchritudo.” Cic. lib. 4. Tusc. Quæst. It is clear, therefore, that Pulchritudo includes the symmetry of the parts, the regularity of the features, and the beauty of colour. Forma, as opposed to Pulchritudo, refers entirely to the figure, though sometimes used in a more extensive sense. See Ter. Eun. ii. 3. 4.—ii. 3. 7. Ph. i. 2. 54. 58. Eun. ii. 3, 21, 22, 23.

EXERCISE.

Cæcinna Pætus, the husband of Arria, was sick; her son also was sick, each, as it seemed, irrecoverably. The son died, a youth of uncommon beauty, of great modesty, and very dear to his parents. Arria prepared for his funeral, and conducted it in such a manner, that her husband knew nothing of it. Nay, as often as she entered his bedchamber, she pretended that her son was alive, and was better. When he asked what the boy was doing, she used to answer, “ He has rested well, and has eaten his victuals with pleasure.” At last, when her tears, long restrained, overcame her, and burst forth, she retired to her chamber, and gave herself up to grief.

OBSERVATIONS.

PETERE.

QUÆRERE.

The former means “to ask,” or “seek,” in order to receive—the latter, “to seek,” or “search for,” in order to find. “Responsum dedit petenti.” Virg. Ecl. i. 45. “Ubi quæram, ubi investigem?” Ter. Eun. ii. 3. 3. “Ask, and ye shall receive—seek, and ye shall find.”—“Petite, et impetrabitis—quærite, et invenietis.” To ask any one a question is rendered by Quærere aliquid ex aliquo.

When the verb “to go,” in English, expresses an effort, endeavour, or preparation, for any action, it is rendered by ire; thus, “Are you going to advance your reputation at the hazard of my life?” In mea vita, tu laudem is quæsitum? that is, “are you setting yourself about advancing?” When no studied effort or preparation is implied, it is expressed by the future participle; thus, “I am going to read,” Lectorus sum.

EXERCISE.

When she had her fill of crying, she returned to her husband with a composed countenance, and endeavoured to sooth his grief for the loss of their son. After Scribonianus, who had made war on Claudius, was slain, Pætus, who had been of his party, was dragged to Rome. When he was going to embark, Arria entreated the soldiers, that she might be put on board along with him. "You are going to furnish him," said she, "with servants, from whose hands he may receive his food, by whom he may be dressed, and by whom he may be undressed. All these things I alone will perform." She did not, however, obtain her request.

OBSERVATIONS.

MURUS.	PARIES.	MŒNIA.	MACERIA.
--------	---------	--------	----------

The explanation already given of the three first, I shall briefly repeat. (See p. 2.) Murus is the wall of a city, of a town, or of any edifice, generally of stone: it is sometimes, however, applied to a rampart of earth, or rubbish. Paries is the wall of a private house, either exterior or interior. Mœnia is a fortified wall. Maceria is a wall inclosing a garden, a villa, a grove, or a vineyard, composed of any materials. "Maceria ex calce, cæmentis, silice, ut dominus omnia ad opus præbeat; altam pedes quinque facito." Cato R. R. cap. 15. Varro enumerates four kinds, e lapide, e lateribus coctis, e lateribus crudis, ex terra et lapidibus compositis. Cæsar has employed it to denote a rampart. "Fossamque et materiam sic in altitudinem pedum prædicaverant." B. G. vii. 69. Some read materiam, but, as we conceive, with less propriety.

In the following exercise, an expression occurs, which the junior scholar, misled by the English idiom, is apt to render incorrectly. The expression, to which I allude, is “determined to die,” which I have frequently seen rendered by statutus, in concord with the person determining. This is a violation of that rule, by which the accusative after the active verb, invariably becomes the nominative to it in the passive voice. The verb statuere governs the accusative of the thing determined, or resolved upon; therefore the thing determined, and not the person determining, must be the nominative to the passive verb. We say statutum est “It was determined,” but not statutus est for “He was determined.” This would be to confound the person resolving with the thing resolved upon. The proper expressions are morti, or in mortem, intentus, ad moriendum, obstinatus.

From is frequently rendered by ne, quo minus, or the infinitive, instead of the gerund; thus, “A certain accident prevented me from doing it,”—“Casus quidam, ne facerem, impedivit.” Cic. Ep. Fam. xi. 10. “Nothing hinders us from being able to do it,”—“Nihil impedit, quo minus facere possimus.” Cic. de Fin. i. 58. “They are prohibited from going to their children,”—“Prohibentur adire filios suos.” Cic. in Verr. It is at the same time to be observed, that ne and quo minus are not used indiscriminately in such examples. If the preceding clause be negative, the latter, and not the former, must be employed. Thus we say, Impedivit, ne, or quo minus, facerem; but we cannot say, Nihil impedivit, ne facerem, but quo minus facerem. Recusavit ne, or quin, or quo minus diceret; but we must not say, Non recusavit, ne diceret. The same observation is applicable to other verbs of hindering, or restraining, followed by ne, or quo minus.

CADERE.

RUERE.

CORRUERE.

Cadere is simply “to fall.” Ruere, and Corruere (ruere unā) signify, “to fall with violence, or precipitation.” Corruere is often used for the simple verb.

EXERCISE.

Arria, therefore, hired a fishing-boat, and followed the ship. When she came to Rome, and, despairing of her husband’s safety, seemed determined to die, she was very strictly watched by her friends. Perceiving this, she said, “Ye lose your labour; for ye may make me die painfully, but ye cannot prevent me from dying.” At the same time, starting up from her chair, she knocked her head with great violence against the wall, and fell. Stunned for a little, upon recovering she said, “I told you, that I would find a hard death, if you should deny me an easy one.”

OBSERVATIONS.

The difference between the English and the Latin idioms, in expressing “ability,” “liberty,” “duty,” and “will,” requires some explanation. In English, when these circumstances are to be expressed as present, the verb governing, and also its regimen, are each put in the present tense, as “I can read,” “We will go,” “Thou mayest depart,” “I ought to write.” And when these circumstances are to be denoted as past, both verbs are put in the preterite tense, as “I could have read,” “We would have gone,” “Thou mightest have departed,” “I ought to have written.” Now, when present duty, present ability, present will, or present liberty is to be expressed, the idioms of the two languages concur, as Possum legere. Ire volumus. Discedere licet. Scribere debeo. But, when “the duty,” “the ability,” “the will,” or “the liberty,” is to be denoted as past, it is only the verb, which expresses these circumstances, that is in Latin put in the preterite tense, the verb following being almost always put in the present tense. Thus, Legere potui. Ire volumus. Discedere licuit. Scribere debui. In these examples, the past time is sufficiently denoted in Latin by the preterite tense of the governing verb. Perspicuity does not require, that the latter of the two verbs, as is the case in English, shall also be put in the preterite tense. It is to be observed, at the same time, that the English verb Ought, which was originally a preterite tense, is now used only as a present; and that past duty must, therefore, necessarily be expressed by the preterite tense of the following verb; as, “I ought to read.” “I ought to have read.” In Latin, as has been just now remarked, the past obligation is expressed by the preterite tense of the verb, denoting the obligation, as Legere debui.—Legere me oportuit; the object of the obligation being correctly signified by the present tense, to be relatively present, or contemporaneous with the obligation itself. Thus also in expressing future obligation, as Debebis legere. Te legere oportebit. “It will be your duty to read.”

Good prose writers generally observe this phraseology, almost uniformly signifying “the duty,” “liberty,” “ability,” or “will,” as past, present, or future, by the tense of the verb, denoting any of these circumstances, and not by the tense of the verb following in the infinitive. A few examples of a different phraseology with the verb Debo, occur in Cicero; but they are very rare. “Quid enim debuit prætor fecisse?” Cic. in Verr.

Poets more frequently deviate from this general usage. Thus Juvenal (Sat. iii. 163.) says,

“ Debuerant olim tenues migrasse Quirites.”

Nothing can be more evident, than that the obligation, or duty, and the object of that duty, how far back soever the obligation may be referred, must be contemporaneous, that is, that the one must be present in relation to the other. When Parmeno says, “Oportuit rem prænarrasse me.” Ter. Eun. v. 6. 12, oportuit sufficiently expresses the past obligation. Prænarrare would have been more conformable to general usage.

The learner is sometimes at a loss to determine when he ought to employ the impersonal, and when the personal verb. "I please," is sometimes rendered Ego placebo, and at other times, Placet mihi. "I delight," Ego delecto, and also Delectat me. The two following rules will, it is hoped, render this matter sufficiently plain.

1st. If the verb, in English, be followed by an infinitive mood, the impersonal verb should be employed, to which the infinitive mood is, strictly speaking, the nominative : as, "I please to read," Placet mihi legere, that is, "To read pleases me." If it be not followed by an infinitive mood in English, the personal verb must be used, as "I please all men," Omnibus placebo.

2dly. If the nominative to the verb, in English, be active, the personal verb must be employed, as "I delight my friends," Amicos meos delecto. Here the principal subject, or nominative to the verb, is active ; I am doing, not suffering. But if the subject, or nominative, be passive, the impersonal verb should be used, as "I delight to read," Delectat me legere, that is, "To read delights me," or "I am delighted with reading," equivalent to Delector legendō.

EXERCISE.

After Pætus was put to death, if Arria had pleased to survive her husband, she would have been allowed to live, being the very intimate friend of Messalina the wife of Claudius ; but she preferred dying with her husband. Nay, that she might rouse him to meet death, like a man, she first plunged the dagger into her own breast ; then, extracting it from the wound, she held it out to him, and said, “ Pætus, I feel no pain.”

Conjugal affection is ordained by nature to mitigate the sorrows, and ease the labours of human life. It makes adversity less, and prosperity greater. Domestic pleasures are, unquestionably, preferable to all others.

OBSERVATIONS.

The Latins have no simple future subjunctive, the tense, which is commonly called by that name, being truly an indicative tense, and denoting a future action, as absolutely perfected, before another action, likewise future, shall have been completed. Thus, Cœnabo, while it signifies, “ I shall sup,” indefinitely, denotes also, “ I shall be at supper,” or “ I shall be supping.” Cœnavero implies, that the future action will be perfected, and means, “ I shall have supped,” or “ I shall have finished supper.” They are each an indicative tense : the former is the future imperfect ; and the latter the future perfect. Thus, “ Quod mihi dederit de hac re consilium, id sequar.” Ter. Ph. ii. 3. 21. Here both events are future, namely, “ the giving advice,” and “ the following it.” But as the advice must be given, before it can be followed, in other words, as the act of counselling must be completed, before the observance of the advice can take place, the former is expressed in the perfect future, and the latter in the imperfect.

The learner, therefore, must remember, that the Latins have no future subjunctive; and that they supply its place by the future participle, and the verb Sum; thus, Amaturus sim, sis, sit, &c. If I say “I doubt not, but he will do it,” it must be rendered, Haud dubito, quin facturus sit,—quin being joined to the subjunctive mood. The mode of expressing the three tenses, past, present, and future, when the clauses are indefinite, is exemplified in the following passage: “Facta autem et casus et orationes tribus in temporibus considerabuntur, quid fecerit, aut quid ipsi acciderit, aut quid dixerit, aut quid faciat, quid ipsi accidat, quid dicat, aut quid facturus sit, quid ipsi casurum sit, qua sit usurus ratione.” Cic. de Invent. Lib. i.

When the future of the infinitive is wanting, the periphrasis Fore ut, must be employed. Thus, “I hope, that he will recover,” Spero fore, ut convalescat, that is, “that it will come to pass, that he shall recover.”—“I hoped, that he would recover,” Spes mihi erat, fore, or futurum esse, ut convalesceret. “I hoped, that he would have recovered,” Futurum fuisse, ut convalesceret.

It is to be observed, that futurum esse, and, indeed, the future of the infinitive of other verbs, are sometimes used absolutely without any regard to the number or gender of the noun preceding; thus, Cicero said, in his fifth oration against Verres, “Hanc sibi rem præsidio sperant futurum.” Several critics, says A. Gellius, conceive, that this reading is erroneous, and that it should be futuram. He produces, in defence of it, the following analogous expressions,—“Credo inimicos hoc dicturum.”—“Hos-tium copias ibi occupatas futurum.” Quad. Ann. “Est quod speremus Deos bonos bene facturum.” Ib. “Omnia ex sententia processurum esse.” Val. Ant.

“Etiamne habet Casinæ gladium? Habet, sed duos Quibus, altero te occisurum ait, altero villicum.”

Plaut. Cas.

Without impeaching the critical sagacity of A. Gellius, it may be safely affirmed, that this form of expression is totally unworthy of imitation. See Aul. Gell. lib. i. cap. 7.

It is to be observed also, as has been already remarked concerning the participles, that fore, which is equivalent to futurum esse, vel fuisse, does not determine the tense of the verb following ut. The tense of the verb, which follows ut, is determined according to the rule already given, by the tense of the principal verb in the sentence, and is not affected either by fore, or by an intervening participle. “I hope, that he will be willing,” Spero fore, ut velit. Here the governing verb is present. “I hoped, that he would be willing,” Speravi fore, ut vellet. In the former example, the present tense (spero) requires ut velit; in the latter, the preterite (speravi) requires ut vellet. “He returned home, believing that his son would recover,” Domum rediit, credens fore, ut filius conva- lesceret. The tense convalesceret is determined by rediit, and is nowise affected either by fore, or the participle.

NUNC.

MODO.

MOX.

Nunc signifies "Now," or "at this time;" Modo, "Just now," or "A little before this time;" Mox, "Now," "Immediately," or "A little after this time;" as, "Ex sua libidine moderantur quæ est nunc, non quæ olim fuit." Ter. Heaut. ii. 1. 4. "Non video hercle nunc; sed vidi modo." Plaut. Merc. v. 2. 54. "Quid dico nuper? immo vero modo, atque adeo paulo ante." Cic. in Verr. "Discedo paulisper a somniis, ad quæ mox revertar." Cic. I de Dir.

Nunc referring to time relatively present, or to an event, as contemporaneous with another event, may be therefore joined to a preterite, a present, or a future tense. "Sine nunc res facere, dum per æstatem licet." Ter. And. It is emphatically joined with ipsum. "Nunc ipsum ea lego." Cic. Att. xii. 40. "At this very time." "Nunc reus erat apud Grassum divitem Veetius de vi." Cic. Att. ii. 24, i. e. hoc tempore erat. "Nunc adeò ibo illuc." Plaut. Merc. ii. 2. 57. "I will now go." Tunc and tum, "then," or "that time," refer in like manner to time relatively past, or future.

Noltenius distinguishes modo, nuper, pridem, dudum, olim, quondam and diu, thus. "Modo significat tempus vixdum præteritum: dudum tempus paulo longius; nuper et pridem tempus adhuc longius; olim, quondam tempus longissimum; diu continuationem temporis." The last, expressing a space of time, admits comparison, by diutius and diutissime; the others refer to the date of an action or event, and admit no variation. It is remarked by Noltenius, that we cannot say, Quamdiu rediit? but Quamdudum rediit? So also in English, we cannot say, "How long has he returned?" Though we may say, "How long has he been returned?" but, "How long ago did he return?" not Jamdiu animam efflavit, but Jamdudum, or Jampridem, the action expressed not admitting diu. But we may say, Jamdiu mortuus est, not Jampridem, for "he has been now long dead."

It has been already observed, (see p. 102,) that communis is "common," or "belonging to all," opposed to proprius, "proper," "peculiar," "belonging to one only," or "a few."

We say in English, "To have a person or thing in one's eye," "To lie under the eye," "To cast the eye," "To have a watchful eye upon." The Latins more correctly said, In oculis habere,—Oculis subjici,—Oculos conjicere,—Intentis oculis observare.

EXERCISE.

When Solon saw one of his friends, one day, very sorrowful, he took him up to the citadel, and bade him take a view of the houses lying under his eye. When he observed, that he had done so, "Think," said he, "with yourself, how many griefs have been, now are, and will afterwards be, under these roofs ; and cease to lament, as peculiar to yourself, those evils, which are common to all mankind." The same person used to say, that, if all the misfortunes of men were collected into one place, every one, after inspecting the mass, would choose rather to bear his own, than his neighbour's evils.

OBSERVATIONS.

VEL.

SIVE.

Vel, "or," is commonly called a disjunctive, and seu or sive, a subdisjunctive conjunction. The difference is this ; Vel disjoins, or contrasts, facts, or circumstances,—Seu and Sive disjoin names. If the things be contrary, or different, Aut, or Vel, should be used. If the things be the same, and only the names different, Seu, or Sive, should be employed : thus, "It is either day, or night," Vel dies, vel nox est. "A man, or a woman," Vir, aut, femina. "He is a man or a god," Homo est, vel deus. Here the things are different. But if we say, "Phœbe or Diana," (both being names for the same person) we must use Seu, or Sive, as Phœbe, seu Diana. In the same manner we say, Paris, sive Alexander—Ilus, sive Iulus. Sive, in such examples, is merely explanatory *.

* Mr. Potter, to whose work I have already referred, has observed that "Scheller and the author of the 'Gymnasium,' infer from partial quotations, that the two things disjoined by sive are mutato nomine eadem." We may have expressed ourselves

The learner should observe, that in our mode of numeration, we mix the cardinal with the ordinal numerals. Thus we say, “twenty-third,” joining “twenty,” a cardinal, with “third,” an ordinal numeral. The Latins never used this phraseology, unless with unus, which they frequently joined with an ordinal numeral. Thus, “twenty-third,” is vigesimus tertius: “twenty-first,” vigesimus primus, sometimes unus et vigesimus. The latter, or last, numeral in English, will direct the learner to the proper expression. If it be a cardinal numeral, the cardinal numerals must be used; as “one hundred and thirty-four,” centum et viginti quatuor: if it be an ordinal numeral, he must employ the ordinal numerals, as “thirty-fourth,” trigesimus quartus. It may assist the junior reader in expressing numbers, if he will attend to the following directions and examples.

1st. If the number to be signified be under 20, and two distinct cardinal numerals to be employed, the greater of the two precedes, whether the copulative conjunction be expressed, or understood; thus, we say, Decem quinque, or Decem et quinque. We say also, Quindecim.

unguardedly; but it was not my intention to maintain, that sive does not disjoin things, as well as names. In proof of this it is only necessary to refer to p. 195, vol. II. 3d edit. My design was to admonish the reader to use sive, whenever a disjunction of names, and not of things, may be implied: and the observance of this admonition is essential to perspicuity.

2d. In the ordinal numerals, either may precede, thus, Decimus quintus, or Quintus decimus.

3d. When the number is above 20, and under 100, the contrary rule takes place, if the copulative be used, as, Quinque et viginti, Duo et quadraginta. But, if the conjunction be omitted, the greater of the two precedes, thus Viginti quinque, Quadraginta duo.

4th. Above 100, the greater number precedes, with, or without, the copulative, thus, Ducenti quadraginta quinque, Sexcenti et triginta.

The reader should observe also, that in expressing two, or more, thousands by mille, they employed the adverbial numerals, thus, ter mille, quinquies mille, equivalent to tria millia, quinque millia; but they did not say, tres mille, quinque mille. “Some thousands,” aliquoties mille.

These rules are generally observed: deviations occur, but they are not frequent.

The expression of numbers above 100, may be thus exemplified. Were we to express 3000, we should say, Tria millia, or Ter mille; 36,254, Triginta sex millia ducenti et quinquaginta quatuor; 100,000, Centena millia, Centum millia, or Centies mille; 367,425, Ter centena et sexaginta septem millia quadringenti et viginti quinque. Thus, it is to be observed, that any multiple of 100,000 must be expressed by the adverbial numerals, as Quinquies centena millia, Septies centena millia, not Septem centena. The Romans had no distinct term for a million ; they expressed it therefore by Decies centena millia, thus, 9,876,435 they denoted by Nonagies octies centena septuaginta sex millia quadringenti et triginta quinque, that is, “ Ninety eight times a hundred thousand.”

For combinations of units, as tens, hundreds, &c. they had appropriate names. Thus, “ a four,” is quaternio, “ a five,” pentas, “ a ten,” decas, “ a hundred,” centuria, “ a thousand,” chilias. “ Five sevens” would be expressed by quinque heptades, “ four tens,” by quatuor decades, “ three thousands,” tres chiliades.

It has been observed, that when the English is “ in,” the Latin preposition in should be joined to the ablative, and when the English is “ into,” it should be joined to the accusative. This is a very general, though not a universal, rule. To prevent mistake, the learner should always attend to the literal meaning of the verb. If we say, “ He arrived in England,” it must be rendered, “ In Angliam pervenit,” because literally it is, “ He came into England.” The exceptions to the general rule will be specified hereafter.

The junior reader may require, perhaps, to be informed that we say, in English, “ By sea and land,” but the Latins, Terra marique, “ By land and sea.”

EXERCISE.

About this time, a much greater disaster befel Priam, king of Troy. Refusing to restore Helen, the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, who had been carried off by his son Paris, or Alexander, he was stripped of his kingdom by the Greeks, after a siege of ten years, and, at the same time, lost his life. Troy was destroyed in the four hundredth and thirty-sixth year before the building of Rome, and one thousand one hundred and eighty-four years before the birth of Christ. Æneas, a Trojan of great piety, whom the Greeks had spared, left his country, and after a variety of adventures, both by sea and land, arrived in Italy, and succeeded Latinus, king of the Latins, whose daughter he had married.

OBSERVATIONS.

METUERE.	TIMERE.	FORMIDARE.
VERERI.	PAVERE.

The distinction between Metuere and Timere has been the subject of some controversy, among critics and philologists. Donatus says, “Metuo illum, qui mihi aliquid facturus est; Timeo ab illo, cuius causa possum aliquid mali pati, etiamsi ipse nihil in me male consulat. Metuimus eos, qui nos amant. Timemus etiam inimicos.” The latter of these distinctions, it is apprehended, is incorrect. Metuere does not imply the affection of love in those, we fear. When Cicero says, that the sentiment, “Oderint, dum metuant,” would have been unworthy of Æacus or Minos, because they were good men, but perfectly in unison with the character of Atreus, who was a cruel tyrant, he cannot be understood as intimating, that the least sentiment of love or affection existed in the mind of Atreus towards those, who feared him. The former of the two distinctions given by Donatus, is better founded; but it is clearly too narrow.

Metuere, says Dumesnil, is, “To fear any thing, that is distant.” Timere, “To fear approaching,” or, rather “immediate, danger.” The signification here assigned to Metuere, is demonstrably incorrect. Doletus considers Timor as a generic term, including Metus and Formido. This seems nearly to be the opinion of Hill, who says, that Timere is a generic term, signifying “To fear,” without regard either to the nature of the object, or the extent of the evil. Metuere, on the other hand, he observes, implies that a hostile disposition is always dreaded in the person exciting the fear, and that the evil apprehended is great. By this he must be understood to mean, not a hostile disposition actually existing, but an hostility which possibly may exist.

When Ovid says of Numa,

—“Quo non metuentius ullum Numinis ingenium terra Sabina tulit,” Fast. vi. 259.

he certainly does not mean to convey the idea, that Numa dreaded hostility in the gods, as actually existing in their minds towards him.

Let us now attend to the words of Cicero. After observing, that the placid and rational emotion of joy is expressed by Gaudium, and its excess by Lætitia, he adds, that prudence in foreseeing evils, and guarding against them, is termed Cautio; but, if this foresight be accompanied with an abject depression of spirit, and a dereliction of reason and prudence, he says, it may be called Metus. Tusc. Quæst. lib. iv. He then defines Metus to be “The apprehension, or dread, of an evil, impending and appearing to be intolerable,” “Metus, opinio impendentis mali, quod intolerabile esse videatur.”—Hill, therefore, should not have said, “that the evil apprehended is great,” but that it is apprehended to be great, or rather intolerable. Cicero then describes the passion thus, “Metui subjecta sunt, pigritia, pudor, terror, timor, pavore, exanimatio, conturbatio, formido.” Pigritia he defines, “Metus consequentis laboris: terror, metus concutiens, ex quo fit ut pudorem rubor, terrorem pallor et tremor et dentium crepitus consequatur: timor metus mali appropinquantis.” Its effect he describes thus, “Metus efficit recessum quendam animi et fugam,” “It makes the mind shrink and recoil.” Now it is to be observed, that the words of Cicero, when describing Metus, are to this effect, that as Gaudium is the placid and rational emotion of joy, and Lætitia, its excess, or a transport of joy, so Cautio, he says, is the rational foresight of evils, and Metus, that dread of them, which unhinges the mind, depresses the spirit, and disqualifies for action. We may hence, it is conceived warrantably infer from the analogy here instituted, that as Lætitia is a transport of joy, Metus implies excessive fear; the one originating in the recent acquisition of some great fancied good, the other in the apprehension of some weighty impending evil, and each manifesting itself by external signs. It is conceived, therefore, that, while Timor expresses the simple emotion of fear, without any reference to the evil apprehended, as either great or small, or to its effect on the mind, Metus ("Opinio magni mali impendentis." Cic. Tusc. Quæst.), as distinguished from Timor, refers to the conceived magnitude of the evil, and its discomposing effect. Hence we have Timere opposed to Gaudere, as "Minus gaudent, qui timuere nihil." Mart. Ep. xi. 37. and Mæror also conjoined with Metus, each implying the violence of the passion, and its external expression,

"Perturbata animi mens in mœrore metuque."

Lucr. vi. 1181.

"Metus atque mœror civitatem invasere." Sall. B. C. cap. 39.

From this explanation given by Cicero, we may infer, as has been just now observed, that Timor, expressing the emotion of fear in general, has no reference to the evil, as either great or small, while Metus always implies, that the evil apprehended is conceived to be great—that Timor is the fear of an evil approaching ("Appropinquantis"), or coming near us—Metus, the fear of an immediate evil ("Impendentis"), an evil now impending over us—and hence, that Timor, denoting the emotion in general, does not necessarily imply a sense of any great power in the person to injure us, as is expressed by the term

Metus. Accordingly, we find the verb Timere employed, where the evil is evidently trifling—thus, “ Si potes archaīcis conviva recumbere lectis, Nec modica cōnare times olus omne patella.”

Hor. Ep. i. 5. 1.

It appears evident, likewise, from a great variety of examples, which might here be adduced, that the first of the two distinctions, which Donatus has offered, is correct, namely, that Timere does not imply an apprehended inclination in the person feared to injure us—whereas Metuere always denotes an apprehension of hostility towards us, either as possible, or actually existing. Thus, when Martial says to Ligurinus, he evidently means, that Ligurinus intended neither harm, nor inconvenience, to those, who shunned and feared him. The evil also apprehended was inconsiderable.

“ Vir justus, probus, innocens timeris ; ” Ep. iii. 44. 18.

Though the verbs in question are thus distinguished, in many cases they are used indiscriminately, when no particular modification of fear is intended to be expressed. “ Quis aut eum diligat, quem metuit, aut eum a quo se metui putet ? ” Cic. de Am. “ Omnia autem rerum nec aptius est quicquam ad opes tuendas ac tenendas quam diligi, nec alienius, quam timeri.” Cic. Off. ii. 7. We find Macrobius also, when he is describing the effects of fear, as producing trembling, paleness, &c. employing the verbs Timere and Metuere indiscriminately. (See Sat. vii. 11.)

When reverential fear is to be expressed, Vereri is almost always employed. “Metuebant servi, verebantur liberi.” Cic. de Sen. This verb, however, is frequently used to denote simply apprehension of evil, or inconvenience. Cæs. B. G. i. 39.

Pavor is defined by Cicero to be, “That fear, which stupifies the mind.”—“Pavor est metus loco movens mentem.” Cic. Tusc. Quæst. Its primitive and generic meaning, however, seems to have been, “A palpitation common either to fear or joy,” thus, “*Et ni successu nimio lætoque pavore,

Proditus elapso foret inter verba flagello,
Forsan sacrasset Zephyro quas voverat aras.*”

Sil. ad Pun. xvi. 432.

Thus, also, in Livy, “Gallos quoque, velut obstupefactos, miraculum victoriæ tam repentinæ tenuit, et ipso pavore defixi primum steterunt, velut ignari, quid accidisset,” lib. v. cap. 39.

—“Exultantiaque haurit Corda pavor pulsans.”— Virg. Geo. iii. 103.

Formido is defined by Cicero to be, “Metus permanens,” “Constant fear.” See Tusc. Quæst. lib. iv.

Timere, when it governs the accusative, signifies “to fear as an enemy,” thus, “Timere populum Ro- manum." Sall. B. J. cap. 13.—“ He feared the Roman people.”—“ Iram timere possemus.” Curt. vii. 1, “ We might fear his anger.” When it governs the dative, it signifies, “ to fear for,” as a friend, as “ Eo magis refert, me mihi atque vobis timere.” Sall. B. C. cap. 54, “ that I should fear for myself and you.”—“ Pars timere libertati.” Sall. B. J. cap. 43, “ Some feared for their liberty.” “ Si illum relinquo, ejus vitæ timeo ; sin opitulor, hujus minas.” Ter. And. i. 3. 5. Sometimes we have both cases, as “ Quem justitiæ suæ minime timet.” Quint. lib. iv. cap. 1. ad init. “ He fears as an enemy to his justice.”—“ Cum furem nemo timeret caulibus et pomis.” Juv. vi. 17, “ When no one feared a thief as enemy to,” or “ who should steal, the potherbs and apples.”

Ne is used, instead of non, with the imperative mood, and also with the present subjunctive, as Ne time, or Ne timeas, “ Do not fear.” We also say, Noli timere, Nolite frangere, “ Do not fear,” “ Do not break.”

EXERCISE.

Crœsus, king of Lydia, had a son of uncommon beauty, and excellent genius; but he was dumb. The father had tried all means to correct this defect; but all the arts of physicians had been of no service. When the army of the Persians had taken Sardis, and a soldier rushing on Crœsus with a drawn sword, was going to stab him, not knowing him to be the king; the youth, alarmed for the safety of his father, made a great and sudden effort to speak; and, rupturing the string of his tongue, cried out, “ Do not kill my father Crœsus.”

OBSERVATIONS.

ALIUS.

ALTER.

Alius, when followed by alius, means “One of many;” when it stands alone, it means “Another of many.” Alter means, “One of two;” as “Praestat tamen ingenio aliis alium,” Quint. lib. 1, “One surpasses another in genius.”—“Alius alium hortari.” Sall. B. C. cap. 5, “One encouraged another.”—“Alterum alterius auxilio eget,” Id. cap. 1, “The one needs the assistance of the other,” alluding to the mutual dependence of the mind, and the body.

It has been a matter of great doubt, whether the word alter, joined to an ordinal numeral, means “first,” or “second;” and authorities of the highest respectability are divided on this question.—Orosius, Pighius, Servius, Gifanius, with many other critics, contend, that alter is equivalent to secundus;—Sigenius, Tursellinus, and others, among whom, perhaps, may be numbered, H. Stephans, consider it, in such examples, as synonymous with primus. The subject, unquestionably, involves considerable difficulty. That alter means, “the second,” in such expressions as “Proximus, alter, tertius.” Cic. “Primus, alter, tertius.” Id. “In alteram, vel tertiam gemmam,” Colum.—cannot be questioned; but it may be contended, that in these, and similar examples, the connection affixes a meaning to the term, which does not strictly belong to it; for if one be mentioned, alter subjoined must naturally denote a second. Nor does the passage in Cicero, which has been quoted by both parties, determine the controversy ; it being impossible to ascertain, by any document whatever, whether he means the first, or the second. “ Literas accepi tuas, quas mihi Cornificius altero vicesimo die—reddidit.” Ep. xii. 25. The expression, “ Alter ab undecimo,” in Virgil, Ecl. viii. 39, is rendered by Servius and Scaliger, the 13th; several other critics contend, that it means the 12th, and, in support of their opinion, adduce the expression in Ecl. v. 49, “ Alter ab illo,” which, they say, denotes “ The first after him.”

The passage, however, which has created the most laboured discussion, is found in Livy, iii. 33, in which the historian informs us, that the Decemviral power began “ Anno trecentesimo et altero ab urbe condita.” Robortellus endeavours, at great length, to evince by computation, that alter here must mean, “ the second;” and in this opinion he has been followed by several distinguished lexicographers and critics. The argument founded in chronological calculation is confirmed, they observe, by the authority of Dionysius, who makes the Decemviral power begin in the 302d year after the building of the city. Siganus, on the other hand, contends, that alter, in the passage in question, means “ the first,” and appeals to the same chronology. The argument, drawn from the authority of Dionysius, he endeavours to rebut, by shewing that the historian has departed from the chronology of Livy, by dividing the events of one year between two consulates. In this latter opinion, the learned Drakenborch seems to concur.

After an attentive and patient examination of Livy's Chronology, from the foundation of the city to the introduction of the Decemviral power, it appears to me demonstrable, that no decisive argument, favourable to either side, can be founded upon it. The number of years is not recorded by the historian with that precision, which can enable us to determine with certainty, whether alter, in the passage in question, means "first," or "second."—(See Sigon. in Liv. Chron.—Verr. Flocc. Chron.—Robortellus de conven. Supput. Liv. cum Marmor. et Gruter. vol. 2.)

The next evidence adduced to prove that alter means "the second," is likewise taken from Livy, who says, that Attalus died, "Altero, et septuagesimo ætatis anno," lib. iii. 33. That alter here means "the second," is strenuously contended, because Polybius informs us, that he lived seventy-two years. This evidence, however, instead of proving, that alter means "the second," would serve to shew, that it denotes "the third."

Burman has endeavoured to evince, that, when Suetonius says, that Titus died, "Altero, et quadragesimo ætatis anno," he must mean, "the forty-first," because the same historian informs us, that Titus was born in the very year, in which Caligula was killed, which, says Burman, was the year 41 after Christ, and that he died in the middle of September, in the year, according to the same critic, 81 P. C. aged forty years, nine months, and fifteen days. That Titus was born in the year in which Caligula was slain, is attested by Suetonius, and may be admitted as a fact; but that he was born in December of the year 40, and died in the middle of September 81, is so far from being certain, that it seems to me highly questionable. Besides, I must own, there appears to me to be an error in Burman's reckoning; for, if he refers the death of Caligula to January 41, and the death of Titus to December 41, then, if he died in September 81, he was only thirty-nine years of age. If he refers the death of Caligula to January 41, and the birth of Titus to December 40, then the two events did not take place in the same year*.

Another passage has been quoted as evidence, from Val. Maximus, which appears to be equally involved in obscurity, and therefore equally inconclusive. We are informed by that writer, that Plato died, " Altero et octogesimo ætatis anno." 8, 7, 3, Ext.; and we are told by another writer, that the

* As I may have possibly misunderstood the learned critic, I subjoin his words:—" Natus fuit Titus 3 Kal. Jan. anno insigni Cajana cæde, teste Suetonio, cap. i. quod capiendum ante annum cum Cajus sit occisus anno Christi xli. 29 Jan. Obiit vero Titus Id. Sept. An. Christi lxxxii. Vixit ergo annos quadraginta, menses novem, et dies quindecim." See Burm. in Petr. cap. 108. See also Suet. in Cal. cap. 58. Id. in Tit. Vesp. cap. 2.—et cap. 11.

Magi were wont to sacrifice to him, as being more than man, because he died on the anniversary of his birth, and had just completed the square of nine. This testimony, however, is justly questioned, being opposed by a variety of others, some of which make his age eighty, and others eighty-two.

From authorities so contradictory, no certain conclusion can be drawn. There are one or two passages, however, of a less equivocal nature, to which we may appeal. The first is contained in “Dialog. de Orat. cap. 34,” (See Tacit.) “Nono decimo ætatis anno, L. Cassius, C. Carbonem; uno et vicesimo Cæsar Dolabellam; altero et vicesimo Asinius Pollio, C. Catonem, non multo ætate antecedens Calvus Vatinium, iis orationibus insecuri sunt, quas hodieque cum admiratione legimus.” Here, it is presumed, a progression or climax is clearly intended; uno and altero, therefore, cannot possibly be synonymous; nor can the latter mean “the first.” This passage would probably be deemed decisive of the question, were not its authority somewhat weakened by one, if not two, errors in the dates. But as all the editions, with which I am acquainted, have the same lection, the probability is, that the error or errors here involved, are ascribable, not to copyists, but the historian himself. If this probability be admitted, the anachronism does not affect the argument.

There is another passage in the same author, which seems to corroborate the opinion, that alter denotes “the second.” “Illud ex libertate vitium, quod non simul, nec ut jussi, convenient; sed et alter, et tertius dies cunctatione coeuntum absumitur.”

Tac. Ger. cap. 11. Here it cannot be contended, that alter is preceded by unus, primus, or any other word, which might impart to it a signification, which it does not strictly bear. It evidently means “a second,” without reference to any preceding term.

It has been already observed, that the chronology of Livy, from the foundation of Rome to the introduction of the Decemviral power, is too obscure to furnish any decisive evidence, by which we may determine the dates to the accuracy of a single year. When that historian, therefore, tells us, (iii. 33.) that the Decemviral power began “Anno trecentesimo et altero,” it is extremely doubtful, if we compute from the commencement of the æra, whether the 301st or the 302d be intended. But there is a passage in the following book of the same historian, by which the date of the Decemviral power may be accurately determined, and the meaning of the term alter clearly ascertained. He informs us, (lib. iii. 33.) that the Decemviral power was introduced “Anno trecentesimo et altero,” and he tells us, likewise, that the military tribunes were created “Anno trecentesimo decimo.” lib. iv. 7.

Now we know, on the same authority, that there was an interval of eight years, between these two events; for the Decemviral power lasted three years, and he has informed us of five regular consular elections *. Hence, it is presumed, we are justified in concluding, that the Decemviral power commenced in the year of the city 302, and that alter, therefore, means “the second,” and not “the first.” Siginus, feeling the force of this argument, in order to reconcile the two dates with this hypothesis, resorts to the gratuitous conjecture, that L. Valerius and M. Horatius continued in the consulship two years; but this supposition is totally inadmissible.

The meaning of the expressions in Virgil, “alter ab illo,” and “alter ab undecimo,” has been much disputed. It was stated in our two first editions, that “alter ab illo” we conceived to be analogous to the English phrase, “second to him,” and that in the series, alter ab illo, tertius, quartus, &c. ille must be regarded as the first term. In every such series indeed, in which the terms are like, we believe, with a reviewer†, that the term governed by a, ab, or post, is included, considered as the first term. When

- * 302 Decemviri consulares priumi.
- 303 Decemviri consulares secundi.
- 304 Decemviri consulares tertii.
- 305 L. Valerius, M. Horatius.
- 306 Lar. Herminius, T. Virginius.
- 307 M. Geganius, C. Julius.
- 308 T. Quintius, Ag. Furius.
- 309 M. Genucius, C. Curtius.

310	{	A. Sempronius,	}	{	Tribuni Milit. Cos.
	{	T. Clælius,	}	{	Pot. Primi.
		L. Attilius,

† See N. Edinburgh Review, No. VI.

Eutropius says, “Aurelius Commodus . . . ab Augusto decimus septimus Imperator est creatus,” and “Septimius Severus vicesimus post Augustum . . . administrationem suscepit,” Augustus is included, as the first term, making, in the one case, one of the seventeen, and, in the other, one of the twenty Emperors. Consequently, in the expression “alter ab undecimo,” we must consider undecimus, as the first term, and alter ab undecimo, as the second, so that the year is the twelfth, and not the thirteenth. Servius says, that, if unus ab undecimo means the twelfth, alter ab undecimo must denote the thirteenth. Hypothetically this is true, and here the question hinges. If an example of unus, or primus, ab undecimo, can be produced, we should concur with him, in asserting, that alter ab undecimo must express one more than unus, or primus, ab undecimo. We find such examples as “annus primus ab honorum perfunctione.” Cic. 3 de Orat. But here the terms are unlike; and the perfunctio honorum cannot be regarded, as a part of the period. If undecimus then be admitted, according to general usage, as the first term, and no example be found analogous to unus, or primus ab undecimo, alter ab undecimo must express the second term, and denote the twelfth year.

Alius, it is to be observed, means “another,” indefinitely, and is applied to one of a plurality. Alter though sometimes used for alius, strictly denotes “the other,” or “the second of two.” And, in investigating its true import, this circumstance particularly demands attention, that it never denotes “the first,” generally, but “the first of two,” and never even “the first of two,” unless followed by another alter, as alter dixit, alter negavit. When it denotes “one of two,” no distinction of order is implied, as alter oculorum, altera manuum, “one of the eyes,” “one of the hands.” In every other case alter denotes “the second.” When, therefore, we say, Vigesimus et alter,—alter cannot possibly mean “the first,” because it never denotes the first of any number whatever, but “the first of two,” and never “the first of two,” unless followed by another alter. Should it be said, that Vigesimo et altero anno, may mean, “In the twentieth, and another,” that is, “the first year,” it may be answered, that here, it would seem, lies the radical error.—Alter does not mean “another,” but “the other of two,” or “the second.” And though we sometimes find it used for alius, and though in such expressions as “Primus, alter, tertius,” (Cic.) we may say, “A first,” “another,” “a third,” it is to be remembered, that from this occasional indiscriminate use of any two terms, we are not justified in concluding, that the terms are equivalent in all cases, or strictly synonymous. The proper meaning of “Primus, alter, tertius,” is “The first,” “the other,” or “The first,” “the second,” “the third,” or “A first,” “a second,” “a third.” If alter meant “another,” it would be allowable to say, “Primus, secundus, tertius, alter;” but no such phraseology, as far as I know, occurs in any classic. It is incumbent, therefore, on those, who contend, that alter means “the first,” when joined to an ordinal numeral, to produce some example in which alter means the first of any number above two, and also an example in which it means first of any number, unless when followed by another alter. Independently then on the chronological argument deduced from Livy, and that drawn from the passages in Tacitus, the strict import of the term alter, as ascertained by classic authority, to denote “one of two,” and its being confined by classic usage to “the latter of two,” or “the second,” unless the term be repeated, clearly evince, that with an ordinal numeral it denotes “the second.”

Before we dismiss this subject it may be useful to observe, that alter is not confined to “one individual of two,” but often denotes one class, or assemblage, of individuals, as opposed to another; thus, “Quippe imperio alteri aucti ; alteri ditionis alienæ facti.” Liv. i. 25, where the former refers to the Romans, and the latter to the Albans. Thus also Cicero, “Ad Brutum nostrum hos libros alteros quinque mittamus,” where “these five,” constituting one set, are opposed to another set.

Quo is elegantly joined with a comparative instead of ut, to express the effect, or purpose, thus, “Assist me, that it may be done the more easily,” Adjuta me, quo id fiat facilius. “In order to render the matter more wonderful,” Quo rem mirabiliorem faceret. In such examples Quo is properly the ablative of the pronoun, and may be considered, as denoting the measure of excess, as in the expressions, Eo melior, Tanto sapientior, Quo diligentior es, eo doctior erades.

EXERCISE.

A stag, blind of one eye, was feeding on the seashore. In order more effectually to provide for his safety, fearing no danger from the sea, he always turned the whole eye towards the land. A ship accidentally sailing past, the sailors spied him, and one of them, aiming an arrow at him, killed him. Finding himself mortally wounded, he exclaimed, “Ah, wretch, what an error have I committed ! How has the event disappointed my expectation ! I feared the land, from which no harm has happened to me, and trusted to the sea, whence death has come upon me.” The fable teaches us, that those things, which we consider as useful and profitable, frequently bring upon us calamity and sorrow.

OBSERVATIONS.

QUIVIS.

QUILIBET.

QUISQUAM.

QUISPIAM.

ULLUS.

Fronto’s rule for the distinction of these words, is correct as far as it extends ; but it is not sufficiently comprehensive. “Quisquam, Quispiam, et Ullus aut negant, aut interrogant ; Quivis, Quilibet, semper affirmant.” (Fronto.) The three first are used in the following cases.

1st. After negative words, and the preposition sine, which has, in fact, a negative import. “Nos- trarum numquam vidit quisquam." Ter. Eun. iv. 4. 11, "Never did any one of our people see him." "Omnes certatim de mea salute sine ulla varietate dixerunt." Cic. pro Sext.

2dly. In interrogative clauses, as, "Est quisquam, qui, cum hoc cognoverit, suspicari possit?" Cic. pro Cluent. "An hoc dubitavit quisquam omnium, quin is venalem in Sicilia jurisdictionem habuerit?" Cic. in Verr.

3dly. In conditional clauses, as, "Si quisquam fuit unquam—ego profecto is sum." Cic. Att. xv. 4. "Si potuisset illinc ullo modo evadere." Cic. pro Ligari.

4thly. After comparatives, as, "Tetrior hic tyrannus Syracusis fuit, quam quisquam superiorum." Cic. in Verr. "Nisi vos fortiores cognoscerem, quam quenquam virum." Cic.

Quivis and Quilibet are used,

1st. In affirmative clauses, as, "Id quivis perspicere possit." Cic. pro Quint. "Any man may discern that." Quilibet partem legere possum, "I can read any part," that is, "any part you please."

2dly. They are used like Quisquam in conditional clauses, when the word any is emphatical; and they are then elegantly joined with unus, as, "Si tu solus, aut quivis unus in me impetum fecisset." Cic. pro Cecinn.

3dly. After a negative, when the word any is synonymous with every, that is, when the negation is not wholly, but partially exclusive, as "Non temere a me quivis ferret idem." Hor. Ep. ii. 2. 13. "Not every man," "Not any man you please."—"Non quisquam," would mean, "Not any man," or "No man."—"Tantum detraxit, quantum non quivis unus." Cic. in Brut.

These distinctions are observed by prose writers, and very rarely neglected by the poets.

CONSULERE.

Consulo te means, "I consult you," or "I ask your advice." Consulo tibi, "I provide for your interest," "I consult your good." Consulo boni, "I take it in good part." Schorus cautions his readers against using Consulo tibi, for "I give you advice," and observes, that neither Cicero, nor any of the ancient classics, used this expression. "Admonere hoc loco volui imperitiores, ne Consulo tibi pro Suadeo tibi, aut Auctor sum tibi, quemadmodum solent, deinceps dicant; significat enim, Consulo tibi, aut rebus, saluti, gloriæ, &c. tuis consulo, longe aliud, ac vulgus putat, nimirum consilio, opera, studio alicui aut rebus alicujus adesse et juvare."—"Nunc vero nihil pene tam tritum est quam."—"Consulo tibi, ut abeas." "Quid mihi consulis," cum Latini dixerint. "Ego tibi suadeo, Auctor sum." (Verw. Thes. de Phras. Schor. Auct.)

SANITAS.

VALETUDO.

Sanitas is a generic term, signifying "soundness," applicable to body or mind, but chiefly to the former—as, “Petere sanitatem ægri.” Quint. ii. 17. “Animi sanitas.” Cic. 3 Tusc. Quæst. 9. When applied to the former, it always denotes “good health,” as, “Si robur corporibus bonum non est, minus sanitas.” Cic. Valetudo means “health,” whether good or bad, as “Firmare valetudinem.” “To establish good health.” Tacit. Ann. iii. 31. “Quod me propter valetudinem tuam non vidisses.” Cic. de Orat. “On account of your bad health.”

EXERCISE.

Pomponius Atticus, a little before his death, sent for three of his friends, and, leaning on his elbow, thus addressed them: “It is needless for me to relate to you at great length, what care I have employed for preserving my health; for you all know, that I have omitted nothing, which could tend to cure me; now it remains, that I provide for myself. I am determined to give over feeding the distemper; for whatever food I have taken, during these several days, I have by that so prolonged my life, that I have increased my pains, without the hope of recovery; nor can any thing now restore me to health.” He died on the last day of March, in the consulship of Cn. Domitius and C. Socius.

OBSERVATIONS.

For, it has been remarked, is often rendered by quod—as “I praise you for having done it,” Laudo quod fecisti, or qui feceris.

The learner ought to observe, that the word should after that is not always a sign of the future of the infinitive, but frequently of the present; and that should have is often a sign of the preterite of the infinitive, as “It is wonderful, that you should covet riches,” Te divitias appetere mirum est, that is, “For you to covet riches is wonderful,” where Te appetere is strictly the nominative to the verb. “It is shameful (that) he should have done so.” Eum ita fecisse turpe est, that is, “For him to have done so is a shameful thing.”

It has been already observed, that qui is used for et ille, et hic. It is also frequently employed in Latin, especially by Cicero, Cæsar, and Livy, to introduce a sentence or clause, where in English we use the demonstrative pronouns simply,—“Since I have explained this to you,”—“Quod quoniam tibi exposui.” Cic. Ep. Fam. i. 9. “As these things were uncertain,”—“Quæ cum essent incerta.” Cic. Ep. Fam. ii. 19. “Cæsar, induced by these circumstances —determined,”—“Quibus rebus inductus Cæsar—statuit.” B. G. i. 11. “When Cæsar came to the knowledge of this,” “Quod ubi Cæsar resciit.” B. G. i. 28.

For a general explanation of Kalends, Nones, and Ides, we refer the reader to p. 23. We shall here quote a few examples, to illustrate the manner, in which the Romans expressed dates.

Cicero, dating one of his letters to Terentia, says, “Die ante diem sextum Kalendas Decembris Dyrrachii,” i. e. “At Dyrrachium on the 26th of November,” or “the 6th day before the Kalends of December." "Litteras a te mihi stator tuus reddidit Tarsi ante diem decimum sextum Kalendas sextiles." Cic.

Ep. Fam. lib. 2. He might have said decimo sexto die ante Kalendas, or Kalendarum. Of these the first is the most common form of expression ; the last is seldom used by good writers, unless after pridie, as pridie Kalendarum to denote the last day of the preceding month. We find also pridie Kalendas.
Kalendæ primæ, secundæ, tertiæ mean the first day of the first, of the second, of the third month ; i. e.
"the 1st of January, of February, of March." Sextæ Kalendæ is the first day of June, or "the sixth Kalends," i. e. the first day of the sixth month.

EXERCISE.

An old man, an Athenian, during the Olympic games, was desirous to see the disputing of a prize ; but there being no empty seat, he was laughed at and mocked ; for he went from place to place, and nobody would give him a seat. But, when he came to the Lacedemonians, not only all the young men rose up to him, but even many grown men made room for him. When the Athenians and other Greeks saw this, and were vehemently applauding their countrymen for acting in this manner, the old man, shaking his grey hairs, and shedding tears, said, "Ah ! how much it is to be lamented, that all the Greeks should know, what is right ; but that the Lacedemonians alone should practise it."

OBSERVATIONS.

CARERE.

VELLE.

EGERE.

Cicero defines Carere thus, “Triste est enim nomen carendi; quia subjicitur hæc vis Habuit, non habet; desiderat, requirit, indiget.” Tusc. Quæst. lib. i. Here Carere is represented as meaning, “To want,” or “To be deprived of that, which one has once had.” This is the limited signification, which Cicero annexes in this passage to the term in question. Yet in another place he defines it to be, “Egere eo, quod habere velis.” Tusc. Quæst. lib. i. clearly extending its meaning to denote the want of that, which one wishes to have, whether formerly possessed or not. These two definitions appear hardly reconcileable: either by the former is the import of the verb too much limited, or by the latter too much extended. Again, he says, “Inest enim velle in carendo, nisi cum sic tanquam infebri dicitur, alia quadam notione verbi; dicitur enim alio modo etiam carere, cum aliquid non habeas, et non habere sentias.” Ib. He adds, “Carere autem malo, id non dicitur; non enim esset dolendum.” Ib. It would argue more than ordinary presumption to question the accuracy of this explanation; and yet we find numberless examples, many even in Cicero himself, in which Carere is used as equivalent to “Not to have,” whether there be, or be not, a desire to have it, being applied even to an exemption or freedom from evils. In his speech for Ligarius, he says, “Hæc duo tempora carent crimine;" and, in his Treatise on Friendship, he observes, "Valetudo expetitur, ut dolore careas." Cic. de Am. 22. Surely in these examples, as in many others, which might be produced from the same author, carere does not mean, "to be destitute of that, which you wish to have." So also, Culpa carere, "to be free from fault," Ter. Hec. iv. 4. 41. "Ambitione caret pectus?" Hor. 2 Epist. ii. 260. These examples would lead us to conclude that carere is equivalent simply, to Non habere.

Egere signifies "to want," or "to need," as "Interpretatione non eget." Plin. lib. vi. epist. 115, "does not need, or require, explanation." "Quidvis se perpeti malle, quam videri eguisse auxilio meo." Cic. Ep. Fam. lib. ii. 17, "that he would rather suffer any thing, than appear to have needed my assistance."

Velle is "to want," or "wish for," as Nunquid vis aliud? Ter. Eun. i. 2. 111, "Do you want, or wish for, any thing else?"

PENDERE.

PENDERE.

The latter is "to hang," in a neuter sense, or "to be in a state of suspension," as "Humero pendebant sagittæ." Cic. in Verr. "The arrows hung on his shoulder." "Poma pendere pateris." Virg. Ec. i. "You suffered the apples to hang." Pendere is "to hang," in an active sense, but generally used figuratively, for "to weigh," or "to pay."

INVENIRE.

REPERIRE.

Whether there be any difference between these two verbs, and what is that difference, have been subjects of great controversy among lexicographers and critics. Valla is decidedly of opinion, that they are precisely synonymous. This opinion is impugned by Alexander ab Alexandro, who maintains a distinction, but does not explain in what the difference consists. Fr. Fl. Sabinus defends the doctrine of Valla at considerable length, affirming the verbs to be strictly synonymous.

Fronto distinguishes them thus, “Reperimus nostra ; invenimus aliena.” This distinction is incorrect, as the examples, which will be adduced in the course of our inquiry, will sufficiently evince. Some critics have asserted, that Invenire is “To find by searching,” and Reperire, “To find by accident.” (See Verw. Thes. in Vavass.) In evidence of this, they adduce the following expression in Ovid, “Tu non inventa reperta es.” Ov. Met. i. 654, in which they contend, that the poet clearly indicates the difference between the two verbs, implying that, though not found by search, she was found by accident. The argument would be conclusive, if the lection were correct. But we have irrefragable evidence, that this reading is false, and that the passage should run thus,

—“Tu non inventa reperta Luctus eras levior.”

Here we have no decisive evidence of the distinction supposed. In the following example from Plautus, the idea of "search" is clearly excluded. "Mercurium jussit ire; ibi hoc malum inveni." Merc. ii. 3. 23. i. e. in hoc malum incidi.

Others have contended, that the distinction is the reverse of that, which these critics have endeavoured to establish, and that Invenire is "To find by accident," and Reperire "To find by search." (See Nolt. Lex. Ant. Gruter. vol. i. 1045.) Dumesnil delivers it as his opinion, that Invenire signifies "To find," whether by accident or design, and that Reperire is "To find by search," and is said, "of things unknown, or things sought after." Hill adopts the same distinction, but adds, as another discriminating circumstance, that Reperire denotes, that the object searched for is known to exist, and that Invenire does not imply any knowledge of its existence. As far as my own enquiries have extended, neither of these explanations, though they approach nearer the truth, than any of the preceding, appears to be correct. That Reperire does not always denote, "finding by search," innumerable examples may be produced to prove. The few following will suffice: "Nimium negotii reperi." Plaut. Merc. iv. 3. 58. "Ni grato ingratus repertus est." Id. Pers. v. 2. 59. "Qui invident omnes inimicos mihi istoc facto reperi." Ib. Ep. i. 2. 6. In this last example it must be obvious, that Stratippocles did not intend to say, that he found enemies by searching for them. "Propter paupertatem hoc nomen reperi." Id. Stich. i. 3. 22. Here also no desire to find the name of Gelasimus by searching can be implied by the speaker,—“Reperi non quod pueri clamitant, in faba se reperisse.” Plaut. Aul. v. 1. 10. “Nimioque sibi mulier reperit odium ocius sua immunditia, quam in perpetuum ut placeat munditia.” Id. Stich. v. 5. 5. Here also it cannot be supposed, that hatred could be an object of search. In this last example, Reperire is found precisely in the same sense with Invenire, in the following one from Auct. ad Heren.: “Dum eam vitastis vituperationem, eam invenistis, ut timidi putaremini.”

It is equally clear, that Reperire does not always imply, that the object sought is known to exist. The examples already adduced make this sufficiently evident, but the few following may be added: “Aliquam reperitis rimam.” Plant. Curn. iv. 2. 24. The flaw was not known to exist previously to examination. When Cæsar says, “In castris Helvetiorum tabulæ repertæ sunt,” B. G. i. 29, does he mean to convey the idea, that the register was known to exist? The discovery was, most probably, quite accidental and unexpected.

—“Quærit quoque (namque reperta Fistula nuper erat) qua sit ratione reperta.”
Ov. Met. i. 687.

Here also, a knowledge of the previous existence of the pipe cannot be supposed. When Hill quotes from Quintilian the following passage, “Hoc reperire difficilius, quam cum inveneris, argumentis adjuvare,” lib. v. cap. 10, he observes, that the former verb “suggests the labour of investigation, when the object is known to exist; the latter the apparent easiness of the discovery, which had been the fruit of exertion, and not presented by chance.” This observation, I frankly own, appears to me somewhat enigmatical. Does the learned author mean to represent the thing found out (hoc) to be at once easy, and difficult to be investigated; that the one verb suggests the idea of labour, and the other of facility in discovering the same thing, and by the same process? It seems to me, as to Burmann, that the verbs here convey precisely the same idea, and that the sentiment is simply this, “It is more difficult to find this out by investigation, than, after you have found it out, to aid or support it by argument or proof.”

That both these verbs then agree in signifying “to find out,” whether by search or by accident, and are each applicable, whether the object be or be not known to the enquirer as existing, is abundantly evident. It is evident also from the examples quoted, and might be still further evinced by the adduction of others, that these two verbs signify each, deprehendere, investigare, nancisci, excogitare vel comminisci. Hence it has been confidently affirmed, that the verbs are precisely synonymous, and may in every instance be used indiscriminately. To this conclusion, however, we cannot assent, persuaded that in no language are to be found any two words precisely of the same import, and of the same exact character. What then, it may be asked, is the difference? On a subject which has eluded the research, and baffled the ingenuity of the most eminent and acute philologists, it becomes us to offer an opinion, to whatever it may amount, with great diffidence. In no question of verbal distinction has the author of this work experienced so great difficulty as in this enquiry; and as we are prone to estimate a discovery not by its real value, but by the labour, which it costs us, and the number of failures, he has been led to attach more importance to his success in this investigation (if he has been successful) than it obviously merits. The difference then between these two verbs we apprehend to be simply this, that, while iuenire is used to signify “to find out,” in a transitive sense, and also “to invent,” in the abstract, reperiare always refers to some specific object expressed or implied. Wherever the latter occurs, the thing found, whether sought for or not, is, we believe, universally specified. This is not necessary in the case of iuenire. “Fingebat hæc Homerus, et humana ad Deos transferebat; divina mallem ad nos. Quæ autem divina? Vigere, sapere, iuenire, meminisse.” Cic. Tusc. Quæst. lib. iii. Reperiare, as we apprehend, would be here inadmissible. We do not recollect, nor have we been able to discover, any example, in which it is used in this abstract sense; and we conceive, that reperiare would here be equally improper, as it would be to translate the verb in English thus, “To be strong, to be wise, to find, to remember.”

The distinction here offered receives some confirmation from this well-known fact, that, while we have the abstract noun inventio from invenire, we have no correspondent abstract noun from reperire. It would be difficult to account for this, unless on the supposition, that the distinction here offered is correct. We find also the word inventor, expressing the agent, with no object specified, and applied in a general and abstract sense. It is employed, for example, as an epithet of Jupiter, “Jupiter Inventor.”—Repertor here would be inapplicable: for wherever it is used, the object must be expressed or implied, as “pallæ repertor.” Hor. “Repertores legum.” Quintil. “Repertor medicinæ.” Virg. The distinction then may perhaps be thus briefly expressed, that invenire is used not only in a relative, or transitive, but also in an absolute and abstract sense, while reperire is confined to the former, invenire expressing the power or faculty, as well as the act, reperire expressing the latter only.

APTUS.

IDONEUS.

Aptus from apo seu connecto means strictly “connected,” or “conjoined.” “Facilius apta dissolvere, quam dissipata connectere.” Cic. “Nec vero histriobibus oratoribusque concedendum, ut iis hæc sint apta, nobis dissoluta.” Cic. Off. i. 35. And, as things may be mutually connected, either naturally or artificially, aptus came to denote the aptitude of one thing to another, whether natural or artificial. Idoneus refers to what is naturally fit, proper, or right. Conveniens agrees with these in expressing the mutual aptitude of the subjects, quæ inter se congruunt, and moreover signifies quod decorum est, vel consentaneum, expressing a congruity resulting from nature, from art, or from established usage.

Aptus and conveniens differ from idoneus, in that the two former may express an adjustment of things among themselves, with no reference to any other subject; thus we find, “apta inter se.” Cic. “Sibi convenientiæ finge.” Hor. But idoneus always implies, though the idea is not always expressed, some end or purpose, for which the subject is fit, proper, or sufficient; idoneus auctor, “an author deserving credit,” or “proper to be believed,” idoneus debitor, “a debtor fit to be trusted,” locus ad instruendam aciem idoneus, “fit for marshalling an army.” But we cannot say res inter se, or sibi idoneæ, as we say res inter se convenientes or aptæ.

ABHINC.

Schorus observes, that Abhinc is often improperly used by modern Latin writers, to denote future time, or that which commences with the present moment. Thus, “Ten years hence,” is frequently rendered Decem abhinc annis, whereas Cicero never employs this expression, but as equivalent to our phrase, “Ten years ago.” It is incorrect, therefore, to say, Desi- nent induciæ abhinc annis septem; it should be, post annos septem.

Vossius makes a similar observation; but Schorus errs, when he confines his remark to modern writers. He would have correctly said, that no good classic uses abhinc in reference to future time.

It is worthy of attention, that when the name of any person, or thing, is given, in such examples as the following, the proper name does not agree by apposition with the generic term Nomen; but elegantly with the individual spoken of—thus, “My name is John,” Mihi nomen est Joanni, where Joanni agrees with Mihi more elegantly, than with Nomen. “Mansit Silviis postea omnibus cognomen, qui Albæ regnabant.” Liv. i. 3. Here also Silviis agrees with Omnibus. “Cui Servio Tullio nomen fuit.” Liv. i. 39.

As implying comparison or likeness, is rendered by ut, uti, sicut, sicuti; implying a cause, or reason, by quod, quia, quoniam, as, or since—thus, “He did, as I desired.” Fecit, ut jussi. “As you think so, I will forbear.” Quoniam ita censes, abstinebo. In the latter sense, it is also rendered elegantly and forcibly by quippe qui, with the subjunctive mood generally—thus, Quippe quæ in lege non scripta sit. Cic. “As, or, forasmuch as, this is not written in the law.”

EXERCISE.

A few years ago the following affair is reported to have occurred at Leyden. A person, whose name was Mack, went into a shoemaker's workshop. The shoemaker saluted him, and asked him, if he wanted any thing. Mack casting his eyes on some boots, which were hanging there, the other asked him, if he wanted boots. Mack nodded, upon which the shoemaker found a pair to fit him ; and, as is usual, drew them on. Mack being thus elegantly booted, “ How well,” said the shoemaker, “ would a pair of shoes with double soles suit these boots ! ” Being asked, if he would not wish to have the shoes also, Mack nodded. They were instantly found, and put upon his feet.

OBSERVATIONS.

For the mode, in which without is sometimes rendered, see p. 92.

Statim, in stando, “ as you stand ; ” illico, in loco, “ in the spot,” each denoting “ instantly,” “ presently.”

Or when it introduces an alternative question, is expressed by an, the correlative words being “ Utrum, an, ” “ Num, an; or ne enclitic,” followed by an—thus, “ Whether did he do it, or you? ” “ Num ille fecit, an tu? ”—“ Will you go, or stay ? ” “ Visne ire, an manere. ” The same observation is applicable to the interrogative An, taken indefinitely—thus, “ I know not whether he will go, or stay,” “ Nescio num iturus sit, an mansurus. ”

See observations subsequent to the following exercise, on the use of the verb posse

EXERCISE.

Mack praised the boots, praised the shoes. The shoemaker secretly rejoiced, expecting a good price, as the goods pleased the purchaser so much. "Tell me," said Mack, "did it ever happen to you, that any person, whom you had fitted with boots and shoes, as you have now fitted me, ran off without paying the money?"—"Never," said the shoemaker. "If it should happen," said Mack, "what would you do?"—"I would pursue him instantly," replied the other, "with all my might." "Do you say so," said Mack, "seriously, or in joke?"—"I say it seriously," replied the other, "and I would seriously do it."

OBSERVATIONS.

In all expressions in which possum is involved, the learner should always be careful to attend to its proper, or literal, signification. Thus, "I can," is equivalent to "I am able," "I could," to "I was able," and sometimes to, "I should be able." With this precaution, he will be in no danger of mistaking the proper mood or tense, in which the verb should be put: thus, "I would cry out, with all my might," or, "as loudly, as I could;" Clamarem, quantum possem, or, "as much, as I should be able."—"I cried out, with all my might," or, "as loudly, as I could;" Clamavi, quantum potui, or, "as much, as I was able."

For the manner, in which from or to is rendered after verbs of hindering, preventing, refusing, see p. 182.

It is necessary here to refer the reader to the rule formerly given, for the proper use of the Latin genitive, as governed by a preceding substantive, and at the same time observe, that one of the admissible deviations there alluded to, occurs in the following Exercise.—We say, “A glass of water,” “ Liquidi cya-thus.” Hor. “ A pint and a half of wine,” “ Vini sextarius.” Id.

It has been already observed, that when the question is made by ubi, the name of a town is put in the genitive, unless it be of the third declension or plural number, and then it is put in the ablative; thus Rome, “at Rome,” Carthagine, “at Carthage,” Athenis, “at Athens.” See p. 50. When the question is made by quo, “whither,” or “to what place,” the name of a town is put in the accusative; thus Romam, “to Rome;” Carthaginem, “to Carthage.” The sign of the former question is at, and of the latter to. Domus and rus are construed in the same way as names of towns;—as domi, “at home;” rure or ruri, “in the country;” domum, “home,” i. e. “to home;” rus, “to the country;” domo, rure, “from home,” “from the country.” Domus, signifying “a house,” is construed like other substantive nouns, and takes the prepositions, significant of motion or rest in the place, motion to the place, and motion from the place. We find it, however, sometimes without a preposition, denoting “a house.” “ Cum prima luce Pomponii domum venisse dicitur.” Cic. Off. 3. 31. “to the house of Pomponius.” And, when it is joined with any of the possessive pronouns, or alienus, it is almost uniformly so construed, as meæ domi, “at my house,” nostram domum, “to our house,” aliena domo, “from another’s house.”

EXERCISE.

"Come then," said Mack, "I will try you, here's a race for you; I run; do you follow?" With these words, he betook himself to his heels, and ran with all his might. The shoemaker followed in a trice, bawling out, "Hold the thief, hold the thief." At this cry the townspeople ran out of their houses, desirous to see what was the matter. Mack, however, prevented them from stopping him, giving out, that it was a contest for a pot of beer. At last, the shoemaker, despairing of being able to overtake him, returned home, sweating and breathless. Mack, accordingly, carried off the prize; but afterwards paid the money to the shoemaker.

OBSERVATIONS.

ANIMADVERTERE.

OBSERVARE.

"Notamus rem," says Dumesnil, "ut memoriae hæreat; observamus, ut judicium feramus." The purposes of the two acts, denoted by the verbs notare and observare, are here correctly distinguished.

Animadvertere, it has been already observed, signifies sometimes, "To notice without intention," and sometimes, "Purposely to direct the attention to any object." Observare means, "To observe narrowly," or "To watch," implying always a conscious effort. Thus we may say, Eum animadverti, et observavi, "I noticed, and watched him."—"Observes filium, quid agat." Ter. And. i. 1. 142. "Ego te in consulatu observâram." Cic. 7 Fam. Epist. 27.

Note; That animadvertere in aliquem, by an ellipsis of supplicio, signifies to “punish any one.”

The term circumstance means either an adjunct to a fact, as time, place, motive, cause, instrument, or the fact, event, or incident itself. The etymon circumstantia, a word of rather questionable authority, is never used in the latter acceptation. In the former we find it employed by Quintilian on the plea of necessity ; and it occurs also in A. Gellius, who sometimes employs the term appendices. It is not found in Cicero. In modern Latin we read “cum omnibus circumstantiis aliquid scribere,” for “accuratissime,” “diligenter,” or “plenissime perscribere.”

It has been already observed, that what is called the future subjunctive, is, in fact, an indicative tense, and ought to be named the future perfect ; implying that an action now future and imperfect, will be finished at some future time, or before the completion of some other action likewise future, as “Quamcunque fidem ei dederis, præstabo.” Cic. Ep. lib. v. 11. “Si improbus fuerit, duces eum captivum.” Ib. The action expressed by Dederis, and the event denoted by Improbus fuerit, were future and imperfect at the time of writing ; but they are supposed to be perfected, before the actions expressed by Præstabo and Duces took place ; and are therefore signified by the future perfect. Sometimes both the future actions are expressed as perfected and contemporary, as “Gratissimum igitur mihi feceris, si ad eum ultro veneris,” that is, “If you shall (have) come, you will do (have done) me a very great favour." Cic. Ep. lib. vii. 22.

Sometimes the future action, which, in order of time, must be antecedent to the other, is expressed indefinitely by the future indicative, no regard being had to its completion, while the other action or event, which, in order of time, must be subsequent, is expressed in the future perfect—thus, “Pergratum mihi feceris, si disputabis.” Cic.

EXERCISE.

A priest, at Antwerp, had received a considerable sum of money in silver. This circumstance was observed by a sharper, who contrived the following stratagem, to get possession of the money. He lost no time in going to the priest, saluted him courteously, and told him, that a piece of business had been committed to him by his friends, namely, to buy a new gown for their parish priest. “I am ignorant,” said he, “of these matters, and you will do me a favour, if you will give me your assistance. Besides,” said the fellow, “your size appears to me to agree wonderfully with the stature of the parish priest.” As this kind office seemed an easy one, the priest readily undertook it.

OBSERVATIONS.

CULPARE.

CAUSARI.

These two verbs differ widely in signification; but as the scholar may be betrayed into error by the sense assigned to the verb Causari, in all our dictionaries, it may be necessary to explain its proper and classical signification.

Culpare is, “To blame,” or, “To discommend,” opposed to Laudare, “To praise.”—“Illum laudabunt boni, hoc ipsi etiam culpabunt mali.” Plaut. Bacch. iii. 2. 13. Causari, is considered as denoting, “To blamie;” but I apprehend, erroneously. The strict and proper meaning of this verb is, “To allege as a reason,” “To pretend as an excuse,” and, for the most part, falsely. “Causari,” says Noltenius, “est veram vel falsam causam dicere; aliquid causæ prætexere.” Drakenborch defines it to be, “Prætextum pro vera causa adducere.” That the strictly classical acceptation of this verb is, “to allege as a reason,” “to pretend as an excuse,” is sufficiently evident from the general usage of classic writers.—The etymology of the verb points also to this interpretation. See Liv. ii. 32.—“Tela hebetia, manus fatigatas causatus est.” Curt. iv. 16. “He alleged as a reason or excuse (for not consenting to their wish), that their weapons were blunt, and their hands wearied.” “Ille non vacasse sermoni suo regem causatus discessit.” Id. lib. vi. cap. 7. “Alleging (falsely) as a reason, that the king had not been at leisure.” “Illa causata sine custode regnum reliquisse.” Id. lib. vi. cap. 5. “Primos pilos ademit, causatus senium cujusque.” Suet. in Vit. Cal. cap. 44. “Duos pugiones arripuit, tentataque utriusque acie rursus condidit, causatus nondum adesse fatalem horam.” Id. in Vit. Claud. cap. 49. “Inhabilem labori et audaciæ valetudinem causabatur.” Tacit. Hist. lib. iii. cap. 59.

“Si non esse domi, quos des, causabere nummos.”

Ov. Art. Am. i. 427.

“ Nec freta pressurus tumidos causabitur Euros.”

Id. Am. lib. i. 9. 13.

“ Consensum patrum causabantur, quo per contumeliam consulum jura plebis labefacta essent.” Liv. lib. iii. cap. 64. Here causabantur has been generally rendered, “ They blamed,” and Ainsworth so interprets it—but I can see no reason whatever for departing from the proper meaning of the verb, and concur with Drakenborch in rejecting this explanation of the word, as unwarranted and incorrect.—“ Stultus uterque locum immeritum causatur inique.” Hor. Ep. i. 14. 12. Here also, it is conceived, the term Causatur means simply, “ Alleges that the place is the cause of his dissatisfaction,” or, “ offers that as an excuse.” It is generally translated, “ He blames.” There is only one passage, as far as, by careful search, we have been able to ascertain, in which the meaning of causari can be in the least degree questionable. It occurs in Quintilian, “ Nec causanti pupillo, sic tutor irascitur unquam, ut non remaneant amoris vestigia.” Lib. xi. cap. 1. In this passage, and also in the preceding, Stephans contends, that it is synonymous with Culpare, or more strictly, in the latter with Accusationem intendere, and Rollin so renders it. The correctness of this interpretation is at least somewhat questionable; and Burmann, who rejects it, explains Causari, in consistency with its strictly classical signification, as here denoting, “ Causas adducere, quare malæ administrâtionis tutorem accuset, quas si acerbe nimis adducat, non tamen decet irasci tutorem."

VITIUM.

CULPA.

Vitium, specially, or in its more confined signification, signifies "vice," or "moral depravity," and is opposed to virtus—thus "Maxime autem absurdum, vitia in ipsorum esse potestate, nec peccare quenquam nisi assensione hoc idem in virtute non esse." Cic. Acad. Quæst. lib. iv. In its more extended signification, it denotes any "fault," "defect," or "blemish," and is applied not only to persons, but to things likewise; thus, "Uni verbo vitium potius quam virtus inest." Quint. lib. i. cap. 5. ad init. where Vitium, "A blemish," or "deformity," is opposed to Virtus, "An excellence," or "beauty in words."—"Si nihil est in parietibus vitii." Cic. "If there is no defect, or fault, in the walls."

Culpa is applied to persons only, and denotes "a fault," or "error," of a trivial nature:

"In vitium dicit culpæ fuga, si caret arte."

Hor. De Art. Poët.

that is, "An unskilful endeavour to avoid a fault, frequently leads into great errors," "Si aliqua culpa tenemur erroris humani, a scelere certe liberati sumus." Cic. where Culpa "a fault," is opposed to Scelus, "Villany," or "Criminality." In the following passage they are both opposed to Crimen.—"Jam pro-fecto intelliges, inopia criminum summam laudem Sex. Roscio vitio et culpæ dedit." Cic. pro Sex. Ros.

OFFICINA.

TABERNA.

Officina from Facio, signifies "a workshop." Hill, adopting the opinion of Vossius, derives it from Officio, which, he says, at one time had the power of Efficio. On what authority the latter assertion is founded, I am utterly at a loss to understand; and until examples are produced to shew, that officere was originally equivalent to efficere, the explanation must be received as mere conjecture. He observes, indeed, that the due force of prepositions is never fixed early in any language. This is admitted; but at the same time it may be maintained, that the primitive meaning of a preposition is never lost, and that, in all its varieties of signification, this generally constitutes the primary idea. Officina was, originally, I conceive, Opificina, as we have it in Plautus, Mil. iii. 3. 7.—"Si ea in opificina nesciam," and came soon to be contracted into Officina, "A shop for work." Thus, "Quingenariam lanceam habuit, cui fabricandæ officina prius exædificata fuerat." Plin. lib. xxxv. cap. 11. "Opifices omnes in sordida arte versantur; nec vero quicquam ingenuum potest habere officina." Cic. Off. lib. ii. ad finem.

Taberna, by metathesis for Trabena, was a sort of shed, or booth, constructed of boards, (ex trabe), and denoted any erection constructed of these materials. Thus, we find it sometimes denoting “a hovel, or cottage.”

“Pallida mors æquo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas

“Regumque turres.”

Hor. Carm. i. 4. 13.

As Officina denoted a shop, where goods were manufactured, Taberna has been, I believe, universally understood to mean “A shop, where merchandise, or manufactured goods, were sold.” On re-examining this subject, I am inclined to doubt the accuracy of this distinction, and for these two reasons:

1st. The etymology of the word would lead us to believe, that Taberna was a general term, denoting any erection whatever of deals, or boards; and we have already seen, that it was employed to signify “a cottage.” To confine it, therefore, to “a shop for sale,” would be an unwarrantable limitation of a term, evidently generic.

2dly. We find it used, as denoting a workshop, thus,

—“et jam siccato nectare tergens Brachia Vulcanus Liparæa nigra taberna.”

Juv. Sat. xiii. 44.

Pliny also, in one or two passages, seems to have used it in the same sense. It is said, however, that this usage did not obtain, until the Latin language began to decline: but this assertion, I apprehend, is not correct. Cicero, in the following passage, appears, by the introduction of the expression “ Omne instrumentum,” (every tool,) to have employed Taberna for “ a workshop.” “ Maxima pars eorum, qui in tabernis sunt, immo vero genus hoc universum amantissimum est otii; etenim omne eorum instrumentum, omnis opera ac quaestus frequentia civium sustinetur ; alitur otio.” Orat. in Cat. iv. That the term is here applied to workshops is abundantly evident. I conceive, therefore, that the word Taberna, as contradistinguished to Officina, means “ a shop, where goods are either manufactured, or sold ”; and that Officina is confined entirely to “ a workshop.”

EXERCISE.

They went accordingly to the shop of a person, who sold gowns of this sort. A gown was produced, the priest put it on, and the seller affirmed, that it fitted him wonderfully. The sharper, after surveying him both behind and before, praised the cloak, but expressed a disinclination to buy it; alleging as a reason, that it was too short in the forepart. The seller, fearing lest the bargain should be broken off, denied that to be the fault of the gown ; and remarked, that the large purse caused it to appear too short before. The priest accordingly laid down the purse, and they surveyed him a second time. The sharper, upon this, the priest having turned about his back, that they might examine it behind, instantly snatched up the purse, and betook himself to his heels.

OBSERVATIONS.

“ People,” or “ Persons,” is rendered by Homines. “ A people,” or “ A nation,” by Populus,—thus,

“ Many people,” Multi homines. “ A great people,” Magnus populus.

TOGA.

PALLIUM.

Toga, “ A gown,” worn over the tunique by the ancient Romans.—Pallium, “ A gown,” or sort of mantle worn by the Greeks. The distinction between these, and Peplum, Stola, Paludamentum, will be particularly explained hereafter.

REVERTI.

REDIRE.

There appears to be the same difference between these two verbs, as between the verbal nouns derived from them, though the distinction be not always observed. Reverti seems to be opposed to Profcisci; and as the latter signifies, properly, “ To set out from a certain place,” so Reverti means, “ To turn back from the place arrived at,” or “ To set out in return”; whereas, Redire always refers to the place, whence we at first set out, and denotes a return to that place. The former refers to the point, whence we turn back, and the other to the place, whence we originally started. “ Itaque persæpe revertit ex itinere,” Cic. de Div. lib. 1. that is, “ He very often turned back.” “ Dii immortales, quam valde ille reditu, vel potius reversione mea lætatus?” Cic. Ep. ad Att. lib. 16. “ How greatly did he rejoice at my return, or, rather, at my turning back, to return to Rome?”

The attentive reader of Cicero will remark, that he frequently uses Reverto in the sense of the deponent Revertor, but only in the preterite, and its derivatives.

It has been observed, that the preposition To, is the sign of the question Quo, “ Whither,” and that the name of a town is then put in the accusative.— But before the word home, the preposition, in English, is always omitted, thus, “ He returns home,” that is, “ To home,” Domum revertitur.

EXERCISE.

The priest, gowned as he was, instantly pursued him, and the seller pursued the priest. The priest cried out, “ Hold the thief;” the seller cried out, “ Hold the priest;” and the sharper cried out, “ Hold the mad priest.” And, indeed, the people believed, that he was really mad, when they saw him running in such a dress, and that he was pursuing the sharper with some hostile intention. Thus, while they endeavoured to stop one another, the sharper made his escape, and the priest returned home, vexed to the heart, that he had so foolishly and heedlessly lost his money.

OBSERVATIONS.

CONTROVERSIA. DISCEPTATIO. CONTENTIO.

Controversia is “ A dispute, or controversy, concerning any questionable, or doubtful, matter.” It generally, though not necessarily, implies discordance of opinion, and always denotes contradiction and opposition. “ Sine controversia a dîs solus diligere.” Ter. Ph. v. 6. 16. “ Sine controversia.” Cic. pro

Rosc. Com. that is, "Without dispute," implying, that the fact could not be questioned. As a forensic term it is confined by Cicero to points in civil law, or matters relating to property. (See Cic. 2 de Orat.) "Sine controversia omne argentum redderet." Plaut. Curc. v. 2. 69. that is, "Without contesting the matter," or "without litigation."

Disceptatio means "A discussion," or "debating concerning a matter of controversy (de controversia) with a view to a decision."—"Cum esset controversia nulla facti, juris tamen disceptionem esse voluit." Cic. pro Mil. "Though there was no controversy, or dispute, in regard to the fact, yet he wished that the point of right should be debated." It is generally supposed to consist in argument; thus, "Duo genera decertandi, unum per disceptionem, alterum per vim." Cic. It may be observed, however, that Disceptare, whence it is derived, frequently denotes, by metaphor, "To dispute," or "To bring the question to issue by force;" thus, "Dolebam pilis et gladiis, non consiliis, de jure publico disceptari." Cic. Ep. vi. 1.

Contentio means simply, "A striving together." Its primary idea is a strenuous exertion of faculty, corporeal or mental; thus, "In omnibus officiis persequendis, animi adhibenda est contentio." Cic. Fam. Ep. viii. 9. Here it is synonymous with "Intentio," as used by Cicero in similar cases. It implies, secondarily, that this exertion is either with, or against, others, for some common object. "Permulta vehementissima contentione animi ingenii et virium ab eo dicta esse constabat." Cic. 3 de Orat. v. " Summa dissensio est, sed contentio dispar." Cic. Ep. i. 7. " The contest, from the inequality of the strength exerted, is unequal."—" Quum ne contentionis quidem minimæ res fuerit." Cic. Fam. Ep. viii. 9. " An affair not occasioning even the least struggle." It is distinguished from " Disceptatio," by implying a strong exertion of our faculties, whether by argument, or by force—while " Disceptatio" is, I believe, entirely confined to argumentative discussion. It is distinguished from " Controversia" by these two particulars : 1st. " Controversia" implies a question of right and wrong ; the subject of " Contentio" may be any matter whatever. 2dly. " Controversia" does not necessarily imply vehemence, heat, or animated exertion—" Contentio" always does. 3dly. As we may say, Contendere cum re vel cum homine, so we may say, Contentio cum re vel cum homine; but Controversia aut Disceptatio cum homine tantum de re.

It may be observed also, that " Contentio" is nearly allied to " Certamen," " A trial for the superiority," " A contest for the victory;" and hence " Certamen" is sometimes used for " Contentio," as " Diu magnum inter mortales certamen fuit, vine corporis, an virtute animi, res militaris magis procederet." Sall. B. C. i. In the dispute between Xerxes and Artamenes, respecting their right to the crown, Justin (lib. ii. cap. 10.) says, " Controversiam Xerxes referebat non de ordine, sed de nascendi felicitate." Here "controversia" implies "the question of right." He adds, "Hoc certamen ad patrum deferunt,"—"This contest for pre-eminence or superiority."—"Hanc contentionem," would have implied very nearly the same idea, but would denote a greater degree of vehemence. Justin, in a similar passage, employs Contentio, "Inter Scythas et Ægyptios diu contentio de generis vetustate fuerit." Lib. i. cap. 2.

EXERCISE.

Epaminondas was, without dispute, the chief man, not only among the Thebans, but also among all the Greeks of his own time. Before the Thebans employed him as their general, they performed no memorable action; and, after his death, were remarkable only for the disasters, which they suffered. How bravely, and how willingly, he laid down his life for his country, the following circumstances sufficiently bear witness. When he was, with his army drawn up in battle order, going to attack Mantinea, a city of Arcadia, the Lacedemonians, who were intent on his destruction, assailed him singly; nor did they desist until they saw him fall.

OBSERVATIONS.

SENTIRE.

Sentire signifies "To perceive by any one of the senses," therefore, "To see," "To hear," "To smell," "To touch," "To taste;" thus, Sentire dolorem, "To feel pain."—"Meæ istuc scapulæ sentiunt." Plaut. Pœn. i. 1. 25. "My shoulder-bones feel that." Sentire clamorem, "To hear a noise." "Sentio sonitum." Plaut. Cure. i. 2. 69. "I hear a sound." "Qui quodam odore suspicionis sensisset." Cic. pro Cluent. "Had smelled," or "had perceived by smell," (metaphorically). "Ut nudari latera senserunt." Liv. i. 27. "When they perceived," or "saw." Sentire amarum, "To perceive," or "taste, it bitter."

"Nam scelere in tanto, ne quæras et dubites, an Prima voluptatem gula senserit."

Juv. Sat. xv. 90.

His mouth first tasted the pleasure.

Sentire, though properly applicable to the external senses, is frequently used to denote the perceptions of the intellect. "Si quando illa mentionem Phædriæ facit, aut si laudat, te ut male urat?" Th. Sentio, "I comprehend you." Ter. Eun. iii. 1. 48.

The reader should observe, that If, when synonymous with Whether, should be rendered by Num, An, Utrum, or the enclitic conjunction Ne; as "He asked, if all was well," "Quæsivit, satin', salvæ res essent."—"I know not, if he will do it," "Nescio, an facturus sit." Plautus and Terence, sometimes, use Si, as "Visam, si domi est." Ter. Eun. iii. 4. 7. "I will go and see, if (whether) he be at home." Livy, in one or two passages, uses the same particle; but the suspensive conjunctions are much to be preferred.

SCUTUM.

CLYPEUS.

PARMA.

PELTA.

ANCILE.

Scutum is a generic name for any kind of shield, and also a name for a particular sort of shield. The Scutum, strictly so called, was of an oblong form, and externally convex. It was made of wood, generally fig-tree, or willow. These, indeed, seem to have been the materials, of which shields in general were made among all nations, in the earliest ages. (See Lipsius, vol. 3. lib. iii. dial. 2.) The Parma was round, three feet in diameter, as described by Polybius; and, according to Suidas, was made chiefly of leather. The Clypeus was of the same form with the Parma, round, and somewhat convex; but was made of brass—"Ardentes clypeos, atque æra micantia cerno." Virg. Æn. lib. ii. The eye of Polymenus is described by Virgil, as round, like the Clypeus, Argolici clypei aut Phœbeæ lampadis instar.

Æn. iii. 637.

Pelta is described by Suidas, and also by the Scholiast on Thucydides, as a quadrangular, or four-cornered, shield, somewhat resembling the Scutum. Plutarch, in his Life of Numa, describes it as round. Some have believed it to have been of the shape of a crescent, or of a half-moon; and, in support of their opinion, quote and from Seneca, " Lunata latus protecta pelta."—Lipsius, notwithstanding these authorities, maintains, that the Pelta was round, and called Lunata, from its containing two representations of a half-moon, and that this is evinced by ancient stones and monuments, on which the Pelta is sculptured. Pliny represents the pelta to be the same with parma. Nepos distinguishes them, " Ille peltam pro parma fecit." In vit. Iphic. The probability seems to be, that they were the same in shape, but that the pelta was the smaller of the two. The Ancilia were made of brass, and are described by Plutarch in his Life of Numa. The passage may be thus rendered, " Eas peltas ancilia ex figura vocant. Neque enim circulus est, neque peltæ circumferentiam reddit, sed habet incisuram lineæ tortuosæ, cuius reflexi sæpius apices recurrentesque continenter in se mutuo ankylen, seu curvam figuram, reddunt." This description is, unquestionably, very obscure, and the etymology is doubted by Plutarch himself. Ovid says, Idque ancile vocat, quod ab omni parte recisum est.

" Dicit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis."

Virg. En.

Fast. lib. iii. 377.

The four following representations have been given of it;—the last is approved by Lipsius:

Λ Λ 2

The reader, if desirous of further information on this subject, may consult Guther de jure Pontif. Rosin. Antiq. Rom. Burm. ad Fast. Ov. Ald. Man. Quæst. Lips. de Mil. Rom. and Jo. Cam. Problemata.

EXERCISE.

When his friends had carried him to the camp, he remained for some time senseless ; but coming to himself, and feeling that he had received a mortal wound, he asked the by-standers, if his shield was safe. When, with tears, they assured him that it was safe, he expressed a desire to see it. The shield, therefore, was brought to him ; and he kissed it, as having been the companion of his labours and his glory. He asked then, if the enemy were conquered ; and they answered, “ Yes.”—“ It is well,” said he, “ I have lived long enough, for I die unconquered.” He then ordered the spear to be extracted from the wound, and he instantly expired.

OBSERVATIONS.

In English, every male animal is considered to be of the masculine, every female animal of the feminine, and every thing without life of the neuter gender. In Latin, the gender of nouns is generally determined by their termination—thus, Penna, “ A pen,” in Latin is feminine, in English neuter. Nouns, which are sometimes masculine, and sometimes feminine, as the sense may require, are called common, as Hic aut Hæc parens, “ A father,” or “ Mother.”—If either masculine or feminine, independently on the sense, and at the will of the author, they are called “Doubtful,” as Hic aut hæc anguis, “A snake.” When under one gender, a noun denotes either sex, it is called Epicene—as, Hæc aquila, “An eagle,” either male or female. When it is necessary to distinguish in doubtful nouns, whether the male or female is implied, the word Mas for the male, or Femina for the female is added—thus, “He found a bitch sitting beside the infant,” “Invenit canem feminam juxta infantem sedentem.” Just. i. 4.

In English, when we speak of animals in the species, that is, without regard to the sex, we assign them either to the masculine, or feminine gender, according, as it would seem, to the characteristic properties of the animal itself. Thus, in speaking of the horse as a species, we always say, He; in the same manner we consider an elephant, a lion, a tiger, a fox, to be of the masculine gender. On the contrary, when we speak of a hare, or a cat, if their sex is not known, or not regarded, we always assign them to the feminine gender—thus, “A cat, as she beholds the light, draws the ball of her eye small and long.” It is to be observed also, that, in speaking of animals, especially those of inferior size, we frequently consider them as devoid of sex. “The mouse is an animal, timid in its nature, and quick in all its motions.”

Now, in this respect, the idiom of the English, and that of the Latin language, are very different.

In Latin, Felis, for example, is always considered as feminine—it is never spoken of as neuter; so also, Mus, “A mouse,” Apis, “A bee,” Vespa, “A wasp,” Pulex, “A flea,” and many others, are never considered, as they are in our language, to be of the neuter gender. We say, in English, “The spider had been his companion, and he was unwilling to hurt it;” in Latin, Aranea fuerat socia, et eam lædere noluit. In Latin, also, as we have remarked, the gender of the names of animals depends generally on their termination, and whether the animal be spoken of, as an individual, or a species, it still retains the same gender. The scholar, therefore, should be careful to attend to the gender of the Latin term, lest the difference of idiom should lead him into error.—Thus, if we say, “The fox saw the lion, and he was terrified,” where the fox, regarded as a species, is considered as masculine, we render it, in Latin, Vulpes leonem vidit, et (illa) territa est.

The auxiliary verb, in English, is frequently omitted, as “Wait, till he return,” Mane, donec redierit, “till he shall return,” or strictly, “till he shall have returned.”—“Stay, till you become such, as you were, when you entered,” that is, “Until you shall have become.” The latter correlative member is concisely and elegantly turned, “(being) of which kind, you entered.”

EXERCISE.

A hungry fox, seeing some bread and meat, which had been left by shepherds, in the hollow of a tree, went in and ate them ; but his belly being swelled, and he not being able to get out, he began to groan, and lament his condition. Another fox, that chanced to be passing by, hearing his groans, came up, and asked him the cause. Having learned, what had happened, he said, “ You must remain there, till you become such, as you were when you entered : and then you will easily get out.” The fable teaches us, that time removes difficulties.

OBSERVATIONS.

FATIGATUS.

FESSION.

These words are thus distinguished by Servius, “ Fatigatum corpore dicimus ; fessum quoque animo, quum tamen fatigatum de animo etiam dicitur.”—The following is the distinction of Noltenius, “ Fatigatus proprie is dicitur, qui vexatione aut molestia aliqua ad corporis lassitudinem est deductus, ut qui tempestate jactatus, aut curru equove duriter vectus. Fessus est, qui labore, onere, morbo, aut angore, deficit. Itaque plus est fessus quam fatigatus.” Nolt. Lex. Ant. When the body is fatigued, or the strength exhausted by labour, exercise, or trouble, we use fatigatus; but it is seldom or never employed to denote that weariness of spirit, or sinking of mind, which is occasioned by care, vexation, or affliction. Fessus is applied to both ; and is not only more generic in point of signification, but also implies a greater degree of fatigue and debility.—“ Animus curis et laboribus fatigatus,” Sall. Orat. 2 ad Cæs. “ A mind harassed with cares and labours." Animus curis fessus, would imply a mind exhausted, or worn out, with cares. Fessus, therefore, rises above fatigatus both in kind and in degree.

ANGOR. MÆROR. DOLOR. LUCTUS.

ÆRUMNA.

"Ægritudini," says Cicero, "subjiciuntur angor, mœror, dolor, luctus, ærumna, afflictatio. Angor est ægritudo premens; Mœror ægritudo flebilis; Ærumna ægritudo laboriosa; Dolor ægritudo crucians; Afflictio ægritudo cum vexatione corporis; Luctus ægritudo ex ejus, qui carus fuit, interitu."

Cic. Tusc. Quæst. iv.

In respect to the generic term Ægritudo, Cellarius observes, that it is improperly applied to the body, and was never so used, till the Latin language began to decline.—(See Lex. Antib.)

He would have said more correctly, that it was very rarely employed to denote, "Disease of body," till the Latin language began to decline; and in the last edition of his "Liber Antibarbarus," and in his "Curæ Posteriores," he has, we believe, so expressed himself. "Sed proprie, ut ægrotatio in corpore, sic ægritudo in animo nomen habet, non sejunctum a dolore." Cic. Tusc. Quæst. lib. iii. But though ægrotatio be properly a diseased affection of the body, it is often metaphorically applied to the mind.—Cicero says, “Quomodo autem in corpore morbus, ægrotatio et vitium, sic in animo.” Tusc. Quæst. lib. iv. And accordingly from this analogy, he applies it to the mind—thus, “Definiunt autem animi ægrotationem, opinionem vehementem de re non expetenda, tanquam valde expetenda sit.” Ib. In the decline of the Latin language, as has been just now remarked, Ægritudo, which we have the authority of Cicero for saying, belongs properly to the mind, was frequently employed to express sickness, or disease of body—thus, Columella, in treating of the diseases of goats, says, “Quod si ea res ægritudinem non depellit;” and Pliny, “Augurium ex homine ipso non timendi mortem in ægritudine, quam diu oculorum pupillæ imaginem reddant.” Lib. xxviii. cap. 6.

Me tædet, “I am weary,” “I am tired of.”— Fatigatus sum, “I am wearied,” or “fatigued.”

EXERCISE.

An old man, having cut some sticks in a wood, was carrying them home. Having travelled a considerable way, and being fatigued, he laid down the sticks, and began to think of the evils of his condition, old age, weakness, and poverty. At last, weary of life, he called on death to come, and release him from his troubles. Death heard the old man’s prayer, and instantly made his appearance, asking him, at the same time, what he wanted. The old man, much frightened, replied, “I called you, only to lift up my burden, and put it on my back.” The fable shews, that even in the worst circumstances almost all men prefer life to death.

OBSERVATIONS.

Nihil is elegantly used for nullus, as, “No money,” Nihil pecuniæ. “No delay,” Nihil moræ. “No cause,” Nihil causæ.

SINERE.

PATI.

PERMITTERE.

Pati, in its proper and largest acceptation, is opposed to Agere, and signifies, “To suffer,” or “To be acted upon.” Ulpian accordingly explains it thus, Negotium patitur is, cui alius negotium facit. Hence it is sometimes applied to a person, who is acted upon by good, as well as by evil, (qui bono, vel malo afficitur) thus, “Fortiter malum qui patitur, idem post patitur bonum.” Plaut. As. ii. 2. 58. Its usual signification, however, is, “To suffer,” “To endure,” as, “Ego’ hæc patiar?” Plaut. Asin. iv. 2. 1. “Shall I endure these things?”—“Patiar quod lubet.” Plaut. Epid. i. 2. 4., “I will suffer,” or, “submit to, what you please.”

Permittere is “To suffer,” “To permit,” or “Give leave.” Auctor ad Her. defines Permissio to be “Rem tradere, et alicujus voluntati concedere.” Auct. ad Her. lib. iv. “Ludere quæ vellem calamo permisit agresti.” Virg. Ecl. 1, “Permitted,” or “gave me leave to play.”—“Lex jubet, aut permittit, aut vetat. Cic. de Inv. “The law orders,” or “grants leave,” or “forbids.”

Sinere is “To suffer,” or “To let alone.” In respect to Permittere, it is merely negative, the one implying that permission is actually given, and the other, that no prohibition, or obstruction, is interposed; thus, “Sine, sine cadere me,” Plaut. Most. i. 4. 15, that is, “Suffer, or leave, me to fall,” “Do not prevent me.” Letting go her hold of him, she answers, “Sino,” “I leave you to yourself, and suffer you to fall.”—“Sine meo nunc me vivere modo.” Ter. And. i. 1. 126, “Leave me to live;” “Don’t hinder me from living in my own way.” The three verbs, therefore, may be thus distinguished: Patior, “non ago” vel potius, “aliquid mihi fit;” Sino, “non prohibeo;” Permitto, “potestatem do.” These are strictly the significations of the verbs Pati, Sinere, Permittere.

It is to be observed, however, that “Pati” (Non agere) is often naturally enough used for “Sinere,” or “Non prohibere,” and also for “Permittere,” or “Licentiam, vel potestatem, dare;” thus, “Fila trium patiuntur atra.” Hor. “Ætas patitur.” Virg. G. iii. 60. Ovid says, “Dum vires, annique sinunt.” Art. Am. ii. 69. “Nec spernere leges sinebant.” Hor. Carm. ii. 15. 18. In these examples, the three verbs may be considered as synonymous with “Potestatem dare,” or with “Non prohibere,” there being scarcely a shade of difference. The contrary sentiment is expressed by Prohibere, in the following passage, “Dum ætas, metus, magister prohibebant.” Ter. And. i. 1. 27.

EXERCISE.

A lady of illustrious birth being condemned for a capital crime, the pretor delivered her to the triumvir to be put to death in prison. The jailor, moved with compassion, did not immediately strangle her, according to the sentence, but wished, rather, that she should die of hunger. He, therefore, suffered no victuals to be given her: nor did he allow her daughter, whom he permitted to visit her, to enter the jail, until he had carefully searched her. After several days had passed, and she still lived, the keeper, by narrowly watching the daughter, discovered, that she supported her mother, by giving her suck. This circumstance being communicated to the judges, her mother received a pardon, as a reward of her daughter's singular affection.

OBSERVATIONS

When there are two or more substantives of different genders, subjects of a common attributive, and expressing persons and things, the adjective and relative are generally put in the neuter gender, but sometimes agree with the nearest substantive.—“Divitiæ, decus, gloria in oculis sita sunt.” Sall. B. C. cap. 21. “Domus, uxor, liberi inventi invito patre.” Ter. And. v. 3. 20. When the substantives express things only, and are of one and the same gender, the adjective and relative sometimes take that gender, though more commonly the neuter. “Misericordia in eo ac perfidia pari jure dilectæ.” Just. “Ex summa lætitia atque lascivia, quæ diurna quies pepererat." Sall.

B. C. cap. 32.

ADIMERE.

AUFERRE.

Aufert, qui dedit—Admit, imperio coactus.
Itaque auferre possumus, adimere jubemur (Fronto. Popma). This distinction, Noltenius observes, is not uniformly attended to; nor is it, we apprehend, quite correct. Auferre, according to Dumesnil, is "to carry away," as from a place, and Adimere, "to take away," or "deprive of." In this explanation, the radical distinction between these verbs is correctly exhibited.

Auferre means, generally, "To carry off," and in this literal sense Plautus has almost uniformly used it. In its several varieties of signification, this idea is always preserved; thus, "Auferre aurum," Ter. "To carry off the gold."—"Auferre laudem." Cic. "Auferre præmium." Plaut. "Auferre victoriam." Liv. "Auferre responsum." Cic. "Paucos dies auferre," "To carry off," "to obtain," or "to gain," praise, reward, victory, &c. "Ne te auferant aliorum consilia," Cic. 2 Fam. Ep. 7, "Let not the counsels of others mislead you," or "carry you away."

Even when the verb is found bearing contrary significations, the radical idea is still retained, serving as the foundation of two opposite meanings. Thus, when Horace says, "Abstulit clarum cita mors Achillem," Car. ii. 16. 29; the meaning is, "Carried off," or "cut off;"—and when Florus says, "Abstulit virtus parricidam," lib. i. cap. 3, he means, "Courage carried off," or "saved the life of, the parricide." It is, therefore, by inference only, or indirectly, that the verb Auferre signifies "to take away," or "deprive of."

"Adimere," which is of the same import nearly with "Demere," signifies "To take away," or "to deprive of," and is opposed to "Addere," as

"Qui saepe propter invidiam adimunt diviti, Aut propter misericordiam addunt pauperi."

Ter. Ph. ii. 1. 47.

"Aliquid additur aut demitur." Cic. 4 Ac. Quæs.—
"Adimam bona." Hor. Ep. i. 16. 7. "I will take away," or "deprive you of, your property."—"Adimat jus." Id. Sat. ii. 3. 217. "Take away the right," or "deprive of the right."

These examples sufficiently evince the inaccuracy of Popma's, and Fronto's explanation. The question then is, what is their exact difference. The distinction given by Dumesnil explains the radical meaning, but is not sufficiently precise, to enable the scholar to determine, when the one verb, and when the other should be employed. It would appear, that the essential distinction between these two verbs, as signifying to "Take from," is this, that Auferre does not exclude the consent of the person, from whom the thing is taken, or his power to retain it; and that Adimere implies, that he has no choice, the person, or thing, "taking away," acting irresistibly, or authoritatively. Hence we find, that when there is implied the idea of deprivation by the exercise of authority or power, Adimere is generally used. Thus, when Val. Maximus informs us, that the senate, in the exercise of its authority, and by way of punishment, deprived Claudius of his liberty, he says, “Libertatem ademit,” lib. vi. 3. 3. When Livy acquaints us, that Ancus, after subduing the Vejentes, took from them the Mæsian wood, he says, “Silva Mæsia adempta.” i. 33. Thus also, “Collatia et quicquid circa Collatiam agri erat, Sabinis ademptum.” Liv. i. 38. “Novella hæc oppida Romanis ademit.” Id. ii. 39. In the three last examples are implied the diminution of strength on one side, and an equal accession on the other, effected by the exertion of authority or power. The idea is fully expressed in the following passage, “Ademptum Medis imperium primus in Persidem intulit.” Curt. iv. 14.

It has been already observed, that “Auferre” does not necessarily either imply, or exclude, the consent of the person, from whom the thing is taken, and that “Adimere” always denotes, that he is acted upon by necessity, or is compelled to be passive. Hence, “Auferre” being a generic term, may in all cases, where obscurity is not created by the use of it, be employed for “Adimere;” but not “Adimere” for “Auferre.” Accordingly, we find them often used indifferently, as in the following examples: “Fortuna vitam ademit.” Val. Max. i. 8. Ext. iii. “Nisi vitam abstulisset.” Id. viii. 7. Ext. vii. “Nec leves somnos timor, aut cupidus sordidus, anfert.” Hor. Carm. ii. 16. 5. “Nec tibi somnos adimunt." Id. Carm. i. 25. 3. "Dat somnos, adimitque." Virg. Aen. iv. 244. "Prospectum nubes abstulerat." Curt. iv. 15. "Prospectum ademerat nubes." Id. v. 13. 12. And when Horace says, the term Auferunt would have been equally suitable, this being, as I conceive, the only difference, that Adimunt implies, that we are necessarily, or without our consent, deprived of many advantages by "retiring (declining) years," having no power to retain these advantages, and that Auferunt, as here opposed to Ferunt, would signify, that while "coming (rising) years," bring with them many advantages, so "retiring years" carry many away with them, or deprive us of many. It would not, however, express the act of taking away, as irresistible on our part, or done without our consent.

"Multa ferunt anni venientes commoda secum, Multa recedentes adimunt."

De Art. Poët. 175.

EXERCISE.

Demetrius Poliorcetes had taken the city Megara. Upon his asking Stilpo, the philosopher, if he had lost any thing, the other answered, "I have lost nothing; for all my property is still mine." Yet his patrimony had been plundered, his sons carried off, and his country taken. He affirmed, notwithstanding, that he had suffered no loss; for that he still possessed true wealth, namely, learning and virtue, which, the enemy, he said, could not take from him. "The things, of which the soldiers have plundered me," said the philosopher, "I never regarded as my own." No man should call that his, over which fortune possesses any power: it may be his to-day, and to-morrow in the possession of another.

OBSERVATIONS.

SEQUI.

COMITARI.

Sequi denotes "to follow," or "go after." Comitari, "to accompany," or "to go along with."—"Neque enim attinet repugnare naturæ, nec quicquam sequi, quod assequi non queas." Cic. Off. i. 10. "Nullo latus comitante." Sen. Hipp. v. 414.

The dative is frequently used acquisitively after a verb, instead of the genitive, and with great elegance. "They threw themselves at Cæsar's feet," "Se ad pedes Cæsari projecerunt." Cæs. B. G. for "Pedes Cæsaris." "Jam admodum mitigati animi raptis erant." Liv. i. 10. It is used likewise instead of the possessive adjective, thus, instead of saying, "It came into my mind," Meam in mentem venit, we say, more elegantly, Mihi in mentem venit, "He delivered it into my hand," Mihi in manum tradidit, better than Meam in manum.

CAPTIVUS.

VINCTUS.

Captivus means "A prisoner," "A captive in war," or generally, "One taken and reduced under the dominion of another." Vinctus, "A prisoner," "A person bound," as "one in jail."—"Vincti solu-tique se undique in publicum proripiunt." Liv. lib. ii. cap. 23. "Ne quis Romanum vinctum teneret."

Liv. lib. ii. cap. 24. Here the word is applied to a prisoner for debt.

EXERCISE.

Alexander the Great, having conquered Darius at Issus, sent some of his people to acquaint Darius's mother and his wife, whom he had taken prisoners, that he was coming to see them. Soon after he sent the message, he entered their tent, accompanied by Hephaestion, who was of the same age with the king, but superior to him in person. Accordingly, the royal captives, thinking that Hephaestion was the king, made their obeisance, after the manner of the Persians. The mother of Darius, being informed of her mistake, threw herself at Alexander's feet, and begged his forgiveness. The monarch, raising her with his hand, courteously replied, "You have made no mistake; for this also is Alexander."

OBSERVATIONS.

ALIQUIS.

QUIDAM.

Aliquis (ex alius et quis) means indefinitely, "Some one or other," as Aliquis mihi dixit, "Some one, or other, told me," implying, "I know not who." — "Certum quam aliquid mavolo," Plaut. Curc. ii. 3, "I would rather have something certain, than something, or other," that is, "something uncertain." Quidam means, "Some one," "some," or "certain." Its distinctive office, as opposed to aliquis, is to individuate, or discriminate. Hence, it sometimes alludes significantly, and with peculiar emphasis, to a person, or persons, known either to speaker or hearer, or to both. “Quodam tempore natus sum, aliquo moriar.” “I was born at a certain time; I shall die some time or other,” a determinate period being noted in the former clause, and an indeterminate in the latter. “Quendam ex amicis hortatus est, ut in equum suum ascenderet, et fuga se reciperet.” Curt. i. 7. Aliquem would imply, “some one or other,” indefinitely; quidam denotes one singled out. “Est quidam, qui illam ait se scire, ubi sit.” Plaut. Cist. iv. 2. 69. “There is a certain person (somebody, whom I know) that says, he knows the place, where it is.”

“Quidam sortiti metuentem sabbata patrem.”

Juv. xiv. 96.

Here quidam refers to a known class of persons.

“Quædam cum prima resecentur crima barba.”

Juv. viii. 166.

Here it is significantly implied, that the crimes were known to the author and his readers.

Its office being to individuate, or discriminate, it is often rendered by the English word one, “a person,” definitely; while unus expresses one, numerically. “Quidam Octavius.” Suet. “One Octavius,” “a person, named Octavius.” Unus Octavius might mean “one,” not two or more.

For aliquis, we frequently find employed “Nes- cio quis," "Somebody or other." "I know not who," as,

"Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos."

Virg. Ec. iii. 103.

"Certe nescio quid secreto velle loqui te Aiebas mecum."

Hor. Sat. i. 9. 67.

that is, "Aiebas te velle loqui aliquid," Nescio quid. In neither of these sentences is the speaker's ignorance of the subject the predicate, or the principal idea; quid, therefore, cannot be considered as indefinite. "I know not, what eye bewitches," and "I know not, what you said you wanted to talk about," would convey very different ideas from those expressed in the original, and intended by the speakers. So also, when Phædria says, "Nescio quid absente nobis turbatum est domi." Ter. Eun. iv. 3. 7, he does not mean, "I know not," or "I cannot tell," what disturbance has taken place; for this sentiment would be expressed by turbatum sit, the principal verb being Nescio, and the leading idea, his ignorance of what had happened. But he means to say, "some disturbance or other (Aliquid, Nescio quid) has taken place in my absence." Here the principal verb is turbatum est, and the primary idea expressed, is, that a disturbance must have taken place. Aliquid is by ellipsis sometimes omitted. "Mos est ci-vitatibus ultro ac viritim conferre principibus vel ar-mentorum vel frugum." Tac. Ger. cap. 15.

DARE PŒNAS.

SUMERE PŒNAS.

In these, and similar phrases, it should be observed, that the proper meaning of the word Pœna is not “punishment,” but “atonement;” thus Dare pœnas, is “To give satisfaction,” “To make atonement,” or “To be punished;” as “He was punished by his father.” Patri pœnas dedit, “He made an atonement to his father.” Sumere pœnas, is “To exact atonement,” “To take satisfaction,” or “To punish.” “Sumpsisse laudabor pœnas,” Virg. Æn. ii. 585, “I shall be praised for having punished,” or “for having taken satisfaction.”—“Pœnas peteret ab optimo quoque.” Cic. Ep. lib. i. 15. “Dum pro civibus suis pœnas caperent.” Sall. B. J. cap. 71, “Should take satisfaction, (for the murder of their countrymen,) or should punish.”—The meaning of the expression, “Capere pœnas,” in this passage, was evidently mistaken by R. Stephans, when he translated it, “should suffer punishment,” supposing that “Caperent” was synonymous with “Subirent.”

The reader should observe, that while Pœna, “The satisfaction,” is put in the accusative, and the person, to whom the satisfaction is given, or who inflicts the punishment, is put in the dative, both being governed by the verb Dare, the crime, or fault, is elegantly put in the genitive, as the regimen of the noun Pœna, while the manner is generally expressed in the ablative—thus, “Egregius adolescens immoderatæ fortitudinis morte pœnas (patri) dedit,” Sall.

B. C. 56, “ Was capitally punished by his father for his excessive courage.”

Audax, “ bold,” or “ daring,” is generally employed, to denote an excess of the attribute, and is for the most part used in a bad sense. Thus, “ O scelestum, atque audacem hominem.” Ter. Eun. iv. 4. 41. “ Alii petulantes, audaces, protervi.” Cic. 1 de Fin. “ At etiam minitatur audax.” Plaut. Rud. iii. 4. 6. In these examples, the term is used in an unfavourable sense. In the following passage, it modestly implies an excess of the quality, denoting “ adventurous.”

“ Da facilem cursum, atque audacibus annue cœptis.”

Virg. G. i. 40.

Examples, however, occur, in which it is employed in a good sense, as, “ Quæ non deliquit, decet audacem esse, confidenter loqui.” Plaut. Amph. ii. 2. 207. Audacia, as has been remarked, is also generally used in an unfavourable meaning. “ Audacia non contrarium est fidentiæ, sed appositum, et propinquum; et tamen vitium est.” Cic. pro Cæcin.

Prehendere, Apprehendere, signify “ To take,” or “ To lay hold of.” Deducere, “ To take,” or “ To conduct.”

It has been observed, that ambo signifies oi duo, “ the two,” and this is its general acceptation. It would seem, however, that its strict and proper meaning is indefinitely, not “ the two” but “ two taken together;” admitting therefore a definitive. “ Attonsæ hæ quidem ambæ usque sunt." Plaut. Bacch. v. 2. 6. We may therefore say, Hi ambo, to express "these two taken together." See Exercise, p. 21. Αμφω, whence comes ambo, and likewise ἀμφότεροι, occasionally admit a definitive. This has been denied by some critics and lexicographers. (See Suidas' Lexicon, and Harris's Hermes, p. 226.) Examples, however, of this usage do occur. (See Stephan. Gr. Ling. Thes. Ed. Nov.)

It may serve to obviate a difficulty, which may present itself to the young reader, if we here observe, that the subject of the passive participle, in examples, of the ablative absolute, is not always expressed by a noun or pronoun, but sometimes by a clause either with an infinitive, or with ut, quod, or quis, thus, "Simul nunciato, regem Artaxiam Armeniis a Germanico datum." Tac. Ann. 2. 64. Here the latter clause expresses the subject of nunciato, and supplies the place of a substantive in the ablative case; or the expression may be considered, as if eo were understood, "it being reported." "Adjuncto vero, ut iidem etiam prudentes haberentur, nihil erat, quod homines his auctoribus non posse consequi arbitrarentur." Cic. Off. 2. 12. "The reputation of their being just and prudent men being added," or "it being added, that the same persons were esteemed just and prudent men." "At Romæ nondum cognito, qui fuisset exitus in Illyrico." Tac. Ann. 1. 46.

EXERCISE.

Rhacoces, by birth a Mardian, had seven sons, the youngest of whom, by name Cartomes, a youth daring beyond his years, was daily doing some mischief or other to his brothers. When his father had repeatedly admonished him to no purpose, the judges, who, by order of the king of Persia, used to travel through the provinces, for the administration of justice, happened to come into that part of the country, where Rhacoces dwelt. Having heard of their arrival, he took his son, and, binding his hands behind his back, dragged him before the judges, and demanded that he should be capitally punished for his contumacy. The judges, amazed at this strange demand, did not pronounce sentence, but took them both to Artaxerxes the king.

OBSERVATIONS.

INDIES.

QUOTIDIE.

Indies, or more properly, in dies, is generally used, when any increase, or diminution, for any number of successive days, is implied; as Indies doctior — Indies crudelior. Quotidie denotes, in general, “On every day,” without any reference to the preceding, or subsequent, days. Hence Cicero says, “Quotidie, vel potius in dies singulos, breviores ad te literas mitto.” Cic. ad Att. Quotidie might imply, “I daily send you shorter letters, than I sent you antecedently to this period,” in which case, “Breviores” would denote no comparison of the letters one with another, which he then sent, but of his letters then with his letters formerly.—This, however, was not Cicero's meaning. He therefore mends his expression by the word Indies, implying, that his letters were shorter, as they increased in number. This is strictly the distinction between Indies and Quotidie; but it is not universally observed. “Hi curatione adhibita levantur in dies: alter valet plus quotidie.” Cic. But though Quotidie, as in this example, is sometimes used for Indies, the latter is very rarely indeed used for the former.

FERRE.

PATI.

SUSTINERE.

Vavassor acknowledges a difference between Pati and Ferre—Perpeti and Perferre; but at the same time candidly confesses, that he could never ascertain, in what that difference consists. Verw. Thes. in Vavass. To determine the distinction between these verbs, it may be necessary to refer to their primitive, or literal signification. Ferre means simply, “To carry,” in any way. Sustinere, “To bear on one's head, or shoulders,” “To support, or uphold.” Pati, “To be acted upon,” or “To suffer.” After carefully examining a variety of passages, in which the verbs Pati and Ferre occur, attending strictly, at the same time, to their literal import; it appears to me, that, though they may be frequently used as synonymous, they differ from each other nearly, as the English verbs, “To suffer,” and “to bear,” which we find also may be often used indiscriminately. The difference between these two verbs, as contradistinguished to each other, may be illustrated by one or two examples, which will also serve in a great measure to explain the distinction between Pati and Ferre, according to our conception, at least, of that distinction.

When it is said, “The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger,” the latter verb evidently expresses simply a state of passion, and alludes entirely to what they feel. If we substitute the other verb, and say, “Bear hunger,” the expression points rather to what they do, than to what they suffer, and implies energy, or the exertion of fortitude. The term denotes vigour, or a sort of reaction in the sufferers. It is said also, “Ought he not to have suffered these things,” (Bible) alluding to the passion. Change the verb, and say, “ought he not to have borne these things;” and you convey an idea evidently different. The one implies, that it was ordained that “he should be subjected to that state of suffering,” the other, “that he should bear, or support, these evils.”

Ferre, in the same manner, seems, agreeably to its active form, to imply something active in the subject of discourse, and Pati as contradistinguished to it, to imply a state of mere passion, or suffering. Their difference is much the same, as that which subsists between the expressions Portare onus, and oneri subjici, the former implying, that the person bears, or carries, the burden; and the other merely, that it is laid upon him. Thus we may say, Onus ei impositum est, et tulit, “A burden was laid upon him, and he bore it." Thus also, Injuria ei illata est, et tulit, may be deemed equivalent to Injuriam passus est, et tulit, "He suffered an injury, and bore it," the former expressing simply, what was done to him as passive, and the other what he did, or how he acted. Hence Terence makes Geta say, "Quod fors feret, feremus." Ph. i. 2. 88, "What fortune shall bring, or lay upon us, we will carry, or bear." It is presumed, then, that Ferre essentially implies action, energy, or exertion in the subject of discourse; and that Pati, in its strict and primitive signification, denotes merely, "To be acted upon," or "To suffer." "Is in culpa sit," says Cicero, "qui faciat, non qui patiatur injuriam." De Amic. Here the latter clause is equivalent to cui injuria fiat: and he says, "Quæ (contumeliae) si tolerabiles erunt, ferendæ sunt." Here patientæ, which would merely imply, that we are necessarily subject to insults, would not express the intended idea, namely, that we ought to bear them.

By an easy and natural conception, the verb Pati, from expressing simply a state of passion, or suffering, comes also to denote "submission." The primary idea of being acted upon, without reaction, is still retained, its signification being equivalent to Non resistere, or Non repugnare. Cicero, indeed, in the following passage, directly opposes patienter to repugnanter, "Alterum patienter accipere, non repugnanter." De Am. This appears to be the meaning of the verb Pati, when the same author says, "Patietur, perferet, non succumbet," Tusc. Quæst. 2, "He will submit, or not resist," "he will bear the torture to the end," "he will not sink under it." When Terence makes Chremes say, "Pateretur, nam quem ferret, si parentem non ferret suum?" Heaut. i. 2. 27, he means, "He should patiently submit to his father's severity (Non repugnaret): for whom should he strive to bear, if not his parent?"—"Omitto, quæ perferant, quæque patientur ambitiosi." Cic. Tusc. Quæst. 79, "I omit, what things ambitious men bear and suffer," that is, "what energy they display in bearing, what patience in suffering."

Sustinere, in its strict and literal acceptation, signifies to bear up, as with the shoulders," "To support;" hence, also, "To withstand." It is, therefore, more nearly related to Ferre than to Pati.—"Magnum onus sustines capite, regium insigne; hoc moderate perferendum est." Curt. lib. vii. cap. 4, "You sustain, or support, on your head a great burden, the ensign of royalty; this must be borne, or carried, with moderation." Here the verb Pati is inadmissible. It is literally distinguished from Ferre by this circumstance, that while Ferre signifies "To bear," or "carry" in any way—the other denotes, "To support," "To uphold," "To bear up against." In this metaphorical signification, it appears to differ from Ferre, by implying not only in general, a weight, or evil of greater magnitude, but also a complete counteraction of the effect, which it is calculated to produce. " Sustinere eleganter dicimur, rem, ad quam perpetrandam non videbamur satis animi aut voluntatis habere potuisse." Snakenborg. Ind. in Q. Curt. The distinction given by Donatus, namely, "Onera feruntur, supplicia sustinentur," is much too confined. It may, perhaps, be correctly expressed thus—"Patitur, cui aliquid fit, vel qui non repugnat: fert qui onere vel malo quolibet sese non levat; sustinet, qui non succumbit." And in the passage quoted from Cicero, on this subject, "Patietur, perferet, non succumbet," we conceive that Non succumbet is equivalent to sustinebit—allowing for the weakness of the negative expression. We find Cicero, in another passage, using precisely this phraseology, "Quid, qui non modo ea futura timet, verum etiam fert, sustinetque præsentia." Tusc. Quæst. lib. v. ad init.

It may be observed farther, that Sustinere is frequently used for Posse ferre. "Nec solus, inquit, bibere sustineo," Curt. lib. vii. cap. 5, "Nor can I bear to drink alone." "Namque Parmenionem nuper acrius quam vellet increpitum rursus castigare non sustinebat," Id. lib. iv. cap. 13, "For he could not bear," or, rather, "he did not dare to chastise."

"At non impositos supremis ignibus artus Sustinuit spectare parens."

Ov. Met. xiii. 583.

"The parent could not bear to look at the limbs."

that is, "Spectaculum ferre non potuit." See Liv. lib. i. 26.

"In the case of," is generally, before a noun, expressed by In, joined to the ablative--as, “In the case of your brother,” In fratre tuo. “Quæ, obsecro te, ista acerbitas est, si idem fiat in te, quod tute in alio feceris?” Gell. xx. 1, “If the same thing be done in your case, which you yourself did in the case of another.”—“Sint misericordes in furibus ærarii.” Sall. B. C. cap. 52. “Pietatem quæ, quum magna sit in parentibus et propinquis, tum in patria maxima est.” Cic. Somn. Scip. In the last, and similar examples, in may be considered, as it is by some critics, to be synonymous with erga.

When we express simple excess indefinitely, we use the comparative only; when we denote the measure, or the cause, of that excess, we use also the definite article in English, and in Latin eo, as “Better,” Melior.—“The better,” Eo melior. This distinction will be farther explained hereafter.

Ferre sententiam et dicere sententiam have been thus distinguished, Judex fert, senator dicit, sententiam. This distinction, however, is not universally observed. “Quum vero jurato (judice) dicenda sententia sit, meminerit Deum se adhibere testem.” Cic. Off. lib. iii. But we believe, that ferre sententiam is not applied to senators.

EXERCISE.

When Rhacoces appeared before the king, he requested, that his son might be punished with death. “Will you, then,” said the monarch, “be able to bear the sight of a dying son?”—“Yes,” said he, “when I cut off the bitter shoots of my lettuces, the mother plant suffers no injury:

but, on the contrary, flourishes the more ; so, when I shall be freed from this son of mine, matters will go on the better, and I shall live in peace." Artaxerxes praised him highly, and ordered him to be seated among the judges, saying, that he, who pronounced sentence on his own son with such justice, would doubtless be an impartial judge in the case of others. The king, at the same time, dismissed the son, with a suitable admonition.

OBSERVATIONS.

ÆDES. FANUM. DELUBRUM. TEMPLUM.

Heusinger explains Ædes, as in the singular number, denoting the cottage, or habitation, of a private individual, which is wholly exposed to view, when you enter it, and is not divided into chambers : also "any single chamber." Vid. Obs. Antibarb. p. 388. From denoting originally a house, not divided into apartments, it came naturally to denote "a temple" or "chamber for divine worship"; and to this latter acceptation it seems almost entirely, if not wholly, confined. Noltenius remarks, that though generally used in the singular number for "a temple," and very rarely for a house, it is sometimes employed in the latter acceptation, and he quotes, as one example, the following passage from Horace, Car. i. 30.

" O Venus, regina Cnydi Paphique, Sperne dilectam Cypron, et vocantis
Thure te multo Glyceræ decoram Transfer in ædem."

Here the lexicographer appears to have erred in his interpretation of the word Ædes. By referring to the passage, and consulting the spirit and intention of the ode, it would seem more probable, that the term in question here denotes “a chapel” or part of the house, dedicated to the worship of the Lares and the Penates. The two passages, which are adduced from Curtius, Snakenborg considers to be chargeable with false readings; and also the passage, which Alciatus has quoted from Cicero’s Oration for Cluentius. Noltenius asserts other authorities; but, as he does not quote them, we can form no judgment of their number, or their validity. When we reflect, that there is only one example in Cicero, and that one doubtful, that there is none in Livy, Cæsar, Sallust, or Suetonius—that the plural Ædes occurs in Plautus more than 250 times, as denoting a house, and not once as a singular,—we naturally suspect a reading, which violates usage so general, as this appears to be. One circumstance however may be pleaded in its favour, which we shall presently notice.

R. Stephans affirms, that Ædes in the singular number uniformly means “a temple,” and in the plural, either “a house,” or “temples,” but differs from templum in this respect, that Ædes is always accompanied with an adjection, as Ædes Jovis, Ædes Vestæ, Ædes sacra. Noltenius more correctly states, in accordance with Valla, that it is almost universally used with an adjection, and that we say with propriety, “Fui hodie in templo;” not so correctly “Fui hodie in æde,” but “in æde sacra.” And here, we would remark, that the necessity of this specification for the sake of perspicuity would seem to indicate, that Ædes in the singular number may, though very rarely, have been applied to “a house,” otherwise the adjection would have been wholly superfluous. Ædes, according to Dumesnil, is a sacred building, raised in honour of a deity, but without the intervention, or the aid, of augurs. Templum, as contradistinguished to Ædes, means “a place” consecrated by augurs, and does not necessarily imply, that it was dedicated to any divinity. Thus, the palaces of Hostilius, Pompey, and others, were called Templa. Denoting “a temple,” (aedificium deo sacratum,) it is distinguished from Delubrum, by signifying a place of larger dimensions, Delubrum being merely a small chapel, or part of a temple; or, as Noltenius defines it, “Ædicula, in qua stat Dei cuiusdam simulacrum—parvum templum, vel pars templi.” The capitol was called Templum, in which there were three Delubra, inclosed by a common wall, namely, Jupiter’s, Juno’s, and Minerva’s. Fanum was a place consecrated for the erection of a temple, “Solum certis atque solemnis verbis quasi fando sacratum.” Nolt. Lex. Ant. “Fanum tantum, id est, locus templo effatus, sacratus fuerat.” Liv. lib. x. cap. 37.

GAZA.

THESAURUS.

Gaza, says Dumesnil, signifies “Riches,” “Money,” “Moveables.” The word is originally Persic; or, according to Epiphanius and Buxtorff, more probably Hebrew, from Ganaz, Thesaurus.—“Gazam,” says Curtius, “pecuniam regiam Persæ vocant,” lib. iii. cap. 13. Gaza, however, was used to denote not only “the riches themselves,” but also “the treasury,” or place where they were kept. Servius, and the scholiast on Lucan, (lib. i. 216,) tells us, that Gaza, a city in Palestine, was so called, because Cambyses left his riches there, when he set out on his expedition into Egypt. This seems to be a mistake; for Gaza was a word used by the Hebrews, and was the name of the city before Cambyses was born.—(See Judges, chap. xvi. ver. 21.)

Thesaurus means a collection of precious things, and also the place where they are kept, either “the treasure itself,” or “the treasury.”—“Theca ubi res pretiosa deponitur; hinc ipsa res condita.” Holyoke.

It is sometimes, however, used in a bad sense, denoting “A repository,” or “store” of evil—and by this it is distinguished from Gaza, which is always employed to denote “An abundance of things, rare or valuable.”—“Perii! tu quidem thesaurum huc mihi apportasti mali.” Plaut. Merc. i. 2. 51.

ACCIDIT. CONTINGIT. EVENIT.

These verbs have been thus distinguished, Contingunt bona, accidunt mala, eveniunt utraque. This distinction is incorrect, the verb accidere being used in a good, as well as a bad, sense. “Omnia secundissima nobis, adversissima illis, accidisse videntur.” Cic. Contingit also is found, though very rarely, expressing the occurrence of an evil, or misfortune. “ Magis adeo id facilitate, quam alia ulla culpa mea, contigit.” Cic. de Or. lib. 2. That the verbs are not strictly synonymous, the following example will suffice to shew. “ Adhibe diligentiam tuam, et intuere quid sint res nostræ, non quid vocentur, et scies, plura mala contingere nobis, quam accidere.” Sen. Ep. 110. Lipsius considers the verb as here equivalent to ex voto accidere. This explanation appears entirely irreconcileable with the scope of the philosopher’s reasoning, whose object was to shew, that immediate good, or evil, is not always ultimately such. Though it may accord with his observation, that evils frequently turn out to be benefits, and so far may be said to happen, as we wish, it is evidently inconsistent with the converse remark, that immediate good often terminates in evil, an event surely not to be wished. We may observe also, that the passage already quoted from Cicero, shews, that contingit is not always used in a good sense, or to denote events agreeable to our wish. General, if not universal, usage, will justify the following distinction. Accidit casu, vel bene, vel male: Contingit sorte vel fortuna, fere semper bene: Evenit quod e præcedentibus exoritur. Hence this distinction is uniformly observed, that while accidit is confined to facts, or occurrences, contingit is applied to persons. “ Nonne debemus optare, ut operibus nostris similis tui scriptor prædictatorque contingat?” Plin. Ep. 7. 33. “ Quanquam ille paternus etiam clarus spectatusque (avus) contigerit.” Id. Ep. 9. 3.

“ It has fallen to his lot to have,” or “ he has had the good fortune to have a grandfather.” In these examples accidit would be inadmissible. And in the passage quoted from Seneca, may not the philosopher mean to say, that fewer evils happen to us by chance, the causes of which were purely accidental, than result from the natural constitution of things, evils thereby issuing in good, and good terminating in evil? See N. Edinburgh Review, No. VI.

In regard to the distinction between these verbs and Evenire, we are inclined to think, that the former refer to a casual, or accidental, occurrence, without any special reference to its beginning, or its end ; and that the latter refers to an accidental circumstance, as issuing, or arising, from something previous ; and has always a regard to the end, or the event. Cicero defines Eventus to be “ Exitus alicujus negotii, in quo quæri solet, quid ex quaque re evenerit, eveniat, eventurum sit.” Cic. de Invent. lib. i.

EXERCISE.

When Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, returning from Sicily, was sailing past Locri, he robbed the Temple of Proserpine; and having carried the money on board his ships, he himself set out by land. What happened? His fleet, next day, was torn to pieces by a dreadful storm, and the ships, which contained the sacred treasure, were thrown ashore on the coast of Locris. Taught by this disaster, the existence of a God, he ordered all the money to be searched for, and carried back into the temple. After this, nothing ever prospered with him. He was driven out of Italy, and died by an ignoble death, being killed by a poor old woman, when he was attacking the city Argos.

OBSERVATIONS.

HORTULANUS.

OLITOR.

The former of these words was not introduced into the Latin language, until the time of the Antonines. “Tullio, et aliis,” says Vossius, “is est Olier.” To the same purpose is the observation of Cellarius. “Hortulanus necessarium magis quam antiquum verbum, quo ante Antoninos nemo superstitem scriptorum usus est. Olier dicebant antiqui, sed significantius est vocabulum Hortulanus, quod Apuleius et Macrobius nobis reliquerunt.” There is, doubtless, an ambiguity in the word olitor, with which the term hortulanus is not chargeable, the former signifying not only “a gardener,” but also “a fruiterer,” or “fruitseller.”

To Draw.

Haurire signifies “to Draw up,” “Drain,” or “Exhaust,” as Haurire aquam, “To draw water.” —“Hausit spumantem pateram.” Virg. “He drained the foaming goblet.” Trahere is “To Draw,” or “To Drag;”—as “Trahere funem,” Hor. “To draw,” or “drag, a rope.”

The great attic Mina, according to De Romé de L’Isle, consisted of 100 great Attic Drachms, or $133\frac{1}{3}$ small Attic Drachms; and was equivalent to three pounds four shillings and sevenpence of our money. Before the time of Solon, it consisted of only seventy-five great Attic Drachms. A drachm was equivalent to seven pence three farthings of our money, and to the Denarius, or Roman penny, or ten Asses.

Donare is construed two different ways—thus, Donare aliquid alicui, or Aliquem aliquam re.

Exercere artem, for “to follow a trade, or occupation,” has the authority of Horace, and is supported by analogy; facere artem is the preferable expression.

EXERCISE.

Cleanthes had a very dull and slow understanding; and was, besides, in indigent circumstances. But, after a love of wisdom had seized his mind, he overcame the slowness of his understanding by study and diligence, attending Zeno in the day-time, and earning in the night a little money, by drawing water from a well, for the use of a gardener. They say, that he was once called before the judges, because, though of a robust body, he seemed to follow no occupation, by which he might get his bread. But, when he brought the gardener, for whom he drew the water, as a witness of the manner, in which he gained a livelihood, he was not only dismissed, but also presented with ten minæ, which, however, he would not accept.

OBSERVATIONS.

INNOCENS.

INNOXIUS.

The former is used only in an active sense, and means "not hurting," the latter both actively and passively, corresponding to our ambiguous word "harmless," signifying "not hurting," and also "not hurt." "Non possum innoxia dici." Ov. Met. 9. 627. "I cannot be called innocent." "Ipsi innoxii, florentes, sine metu ætatem agere." Sall. B. C. "They themselves unhurt."

It must be remembered, that, when the verb wants the future of the infinitive, the periphrasis by Fore, or Futurum esse vel fuisse, must be employed, (see p. 187.)

After a negative, But is rendered by Nisi, Præter, Præterquam, as "Nothing but money." Nihil nisi pecunia, præter pecuniam, præterquam pecunia, "Unless," or, "Except money."

The following phraseologies require the attention of the reader. "Would you have me do so?" Visne me ita facere? "Would you have us wait?" "Visne opperiamur." Ter. Eun. v. 2. 56. That is, "Do you wish me to do so?"—"Are you willing, or do you wish, that we wait?" We also find Velisne, and Vellesne, "Can you, or would you be willing?"

The reader will bear in mind, that "should," expressing duty, or obligation, may be rendered by oportet, by the gerund, or the future participle passive; thus, "We should read," Nobis legendum est, Nos legere oportet, "The book should be read," Liber legendus est, or Librum legi oportet.

Impersonal verbs, in Latin, do not admit a person as their nominative, the person being always put in the case, which the impersonal verb governs, as “I please,” Mihi placeet,—“We happened,” Nobis accidit,—“Ye repent,” Vos pœnitet,—“They are weary,” Illos tædet,—“Who delights,” Quem delectat.

EXERCISE.

Socrates, the most celebrated philosopher of antiquity, was wont to say, that nothing should be asked from the gods, but that they would be pleased to give us, what is good for us. Being consulted by a young man, whether he should take a wife, or refrain from marriage, he answered, that, whichever of the two things he should do, he would repent of it. When the Athenians had passed the horrid sentence on his life, he took the poison out of the executioner’s hand with a resolute mind, and unaltered countenance. When he was applying the cup to his lips, and when his wife, bursting into tears, cried out, that he did innocent, “What, then,” said he, “would you have me die guilty?”

OBSERVATIONS.

SENATUS DECRETUM.	SENATUS CONSULTUM.
-------------------	--------------------

“The Senatus Consultum,” says Dumesnil, “was a Law, or Regulation, the observance of which was obligatory, unless the people rejected it. The Senatus decretum was but a part of the Senatus consultum. To entitle any resolution to the name of Senatus consultum, it was necessary, that it met with no opposition, that the senate had been summoned according to law, and that a sufficient number, not fewer than two hundred, attended. If any of these requisites was wanting, it was called Senatus auctoritas." This is the explanation given by Dumesnil. Drakenborch, who refers his reader to Gronovius, gives the same explanation; but observes, that the expression Senatus auctoritas, was sometimes used for Senatus consultum, even when the senate was legally convoked in sufficient numbers *, and when the decree met with no opposition from the tribune. It is to be observed, however, that the terms Senatus consultum and Senatus decretum, were used indifferently, to express a decree of the senate. Dumesnil says, the noun Decretum, had rather individuals for its object, as when a province, a triumph, money, or a thanksgiving (Supplicatio) was decreed. Consultum embraced also the great body of the people, and regarded the more important political enactments. This distinction is by no means uniformly observed. But, though the terms Senatus consultum, and Senatus decretum are used indifferently, the simple nouns are not to be considered as synonymous. Consultum, when opposed to Decretum, refers to what is resolved, or decreed, by a council, or a deliberative body; and Decretum is "the decision," "decree," or "judgment, of the magistrates." So Havercamp has distinguished them; and, we believe, correctly. "Consulta,” says he, “ proprie, quæ ex concilii sententia statuuntur, ut Decreta, quæ magistratus, non adhibito concilio, pronunciat.”—“ Oportere quinquennii consulta et decreta omnia rescindi.” Sall. B. J. cap. 11. “ Levius enim vaniusque profecto est sua decreta et consulta tollere, quam aliorum.” Liv. lib. iii. cap. 21.

* The reader, desirous of learning, at what particular times, in what places, and in what manner the senate could be legally assembled, may consult Gruter. Thes. Criticus.—Auli Gellii Noctes, Donati Dilucidat. in Sueton. and Adam's Roman Antiquities.

EPISTOLA.

LITERA.

LITERÆ.

Just. Lipsius defines Epistola to be “ Scriptum animi nuncium ad absentes, aut quasi absentes.” “ Epistolarum usus est,” says Ambrose, “ ut disjuncti locorum intervallis affectu adhæreamus.” And Cicero says, “ Hac causa inventa res ipsa (Epistola) est, ut certiores faceremus absentes, si quid esset, quod eos scire aut nostra aut ipsorum interesset.” Fam. Ep. ii. 4.

Litera, in the singular number, is “ A letter of the alphabet ;” in the plural it means, “ Writings of any kind,” and is also, in this form, synonymous with Epistola, “ A letter,” or “ Epistle.” There is, however, this difference between Literæ and Epistola, that the former requires a distributive, and the latter a cardinal numeral—thus, “ Two letters were sent,” Duæ epistolæ, or Binæ literæ missæ sunt; but not, Binæ epistolæ, or Duæ literæ. The latter expression would imply two alphabetical characters. “ Binas a te literas accepi.” Cic. Ep. Fam. iv. 13. Among the poets Litera is sometimes used in the singular number, to denote “ an epistle,” as,

“ Litera pro verbis tibi Messaline, salutem
 Quam legis, a sœvis attulit usque Getis.”

Ov. Ep. ex Ponto, lib. i. ep. 7.

When Cicero says, “ Ille autem, cum ad Thermum de Parthico bello scriberet ad me literam nunquam misit,” Fam. Ep. lib. ii. 16, the latter clause may, perhaps, be considered as equivalent to our expression, “ He never wrote to me a single syllable.”

Epistola is also considered, by some critics, as distinguished from Literæ, by its denoting a letter written for the purpose of communicating instruction, as Pauli Epistolæ, “ The Epistles of Paul.”— When instruction is intended, Epistola is the preferable term; but it is frequently used as synonymous with Literæ.

Concerning the usual form of letter-writing, as practised by the Romans, the following observations may be useful to the young reader. The Romans began their letters with a Præloquium, or Address, expressing first, the name of the writer, and next, the name of the person, to whom the letter was written, as “ L. Catilina, Q. Catulo, S.”—that is, “ L. Catiline greets Q. Catulus,” or “ wishes him health,” “ Salutem dicit,”—the verb being frequently understood. If either of the parties was invested with an office, civil or military, it was usual to express it thus, “ P. Serv. Rullus Trib. pl. x. vir Pompeio Consuli.” When the person addressed was an intimate friend, they sometimes added the epithets, “ Humanissimus,” “ Optimus,” “ Suavissimus,” and very frequently Suus, as “Prætores Syracusani Marcello suo.” The “Præloquium” was, sometimes, conceived in the following terms, “Si vales, gaudeo ; ego valeo,” or “Si vales, bene est, ego valeo,” and frequently written in the initials only, thus, S. V. G. E. V.—S. V. B. E. E. V. The letter frequently ended with the word “Vale,” sometimes “Ave,” “Salve,” to which, in some instances, was added the expression of endearment, “Mi anime.” The place, where the letter was written, was subjoined, unless previously communicated. The date always expressed the day, frequently the year, and sometimes the hour. They used no signature, or subscription, unless when writing to emperors. There was very rarely an inscription on the outside, the letter being delivered to a letter carrier, Tabellarrius, who was made acquainted with the person, for whom it was intended. The letter was tied round with a string, the knot of which was sealed. The seal was, generally, a head of the letter-writer, or of some of his ancestors, impressed on wax, or chalk. “Signum iste animadvertis in cretula.” Cic. “Cedo tu ceram ac linum,” “Give me the wax, and the string.” “Age obliga, obsigna cito.” Plaut. Hence the phrases for, “To open a letter,” Vinculum solvere, Incidere linum, Epistolam solvere. It was usual also for the bearer of the letter, before it was opened, to request the person to examine the seal, that he might be sure, there was no imposture, “Accipe, hem cognosee signum,” Plaut. “Cape, signum nosee.” Id. “Cum prius omnes signa cogno- vissent." Sall. Vid. Lipsii Opera, vol. 2. and Grueter. Thes. vol. 5.

Deponent verbs, whose signification is active, have, in general, the two participles active, and the two participles passive. Hence they have also the future of the infinitive active, which is much more frequently used than the passive form—thus, Loquens, Loquendus, Locutus, Locuturus, Locuturum esse.

"To affirm any thing to any one," Affirmare aliquid alicui. "To assure any one of any thing," Confirmare aliquid alicui.

EXERCISE.

Caius Popillius was sent as an ambassador to Antiochus, for the purpose of prevailing upon him to give up the war against Ptolemy. When he came into his presence, and when Antiochus was, in a friendly manner, stretching forth his hand to him, he, in his turn, would not stretch forth his; but delivered to him the letter, containing the decree of the senate. When Antiochus read it, he said, that he would commune with his friends on that subject. Popillius, being offended at his proposing a delay, enclosed with a circle the ground on which he stood, saying, "Before you stir beyond this circle, give me an answer, to carry back to the senate." Antiochus immediately assured him, that Ptolemy should no longer complain of him.

OBSERVATIONS.

ACCEDERE.

APPROPINQUARE.

Accedere is “To advance,” “To go, or come towards.” Appropinquare, is “To advance near to.” “Appropinquare finibus,” Cæs. is “To come near the territories.” Ad fines accedere, is “To advance towards the territories.”—“Specioso periculo propinquat, quisquis ad reipublicæ gubernacula accedit,” “He approaches,” or “comes near, whosoever advances,” &c. (Dumes.) Hence we find, “Prope,” “Propius,” and “Proxime,” Accedere.

PRÆDO.

LATRO.

Prædo is “A robber,” “A pirate,” or “A free-booter, whether by sea or land.”—“Omnium templorum, atque tectorum, totiusque urbis prædo.” Cic. pro domo. “Si cui naviganti, quem prædones insequantur.” Id. “Maritimi prædones.” Nepos. Latro is “A robber,” or “highwayman.”—He was probably so called, either because he was originally a person, who attended his sovereign, as a guard, quasi a latere; and hence we find the term sometimes synonymous with satelles; or, he may have been so named ἀπὸ τοῦ λατροῦ, that is, a stipe, from the pay, or wages, which he received; and accordingly he is likewise denominated Stipator. Hence, also, we find the word, denoting, “a soldier serving for pay;” and Latrocinari, for “To serve in the army,” occurs oftener than once in Plautus.

It is conjectured, therefore, that, as highwaymen were not improbably, in the early ages of the Roman state, Latrones, or Milites conductitii, the term Latro came to denote “A robber,” or “highwayman.”

EXERCISE.

When Scipio Africanus was residing at his country seat, a band of robbers came to see him. Believing, that they intended to offer violence to his life, he placed a guard of his domestics on the roof of his house, and was making preparations to defend himself. The robbers, having learned this circumstance, threw away their arms, and approached the door, telling him, that they came not with a hostile intention against his life, but as persons, who admired his courage. When he heard this, he desired the door to be unbarred, and the robbers to be admitted. As soon as they entered, they eagerly seized his hand, and kissed it, rejoicing, that it had been their good fortune to see Scipio.

OBSERVATIONS.

FORMA.

FIGURA.

These words agree in denoting the outlines of an object, as perceived by sight or touch. Their difference we shall endeavour to explain. “Figura est dispositio totius corporis, ut hominis figura recta est, prona animantium, mundi rotunda. Forma est facies cuiusque rei, et convenientia partium expleta, atque perfecta, ut in homine forma regia, liberalis, mediocris. Illa discernit genera rerum, et in unoquoque a natura idem est. Hæc species rerum separat, et in aliis alia apparent." Ascon. Ped. Dumesnil adopts nearly the same opinion, forma according to him being applicable to species, and figura distinguishing individuals. Forma, says Hill, refers to a class, to which bodies, though differing a little, one from another, are reducible. "Were there," he observes, "but one object in nature, it would possess figura, but not forma, because there would be no standard. The varieties, of which figura is susceptible, from the possible combinations of bounding lines, differing in breadth, length, and curvature, are infinite; those of forma, on the other hand, are limited by necessary approximations to the standard."

It seems sufficiently evident, that forma signifies not an individual, but a generic, shape; expressing, what metaphysicians call a general notion. Accordingly Cicero often translates the abstract ideas of Plato by forma. There is forma hominis, forma belluae, forma avis; that is, there is a form common to men, a form common to brutes, and a form common to fishes. "Formarum est certus numerus, quæ cuique generi subjiciuntur." Cic. Top. Hence, from denoting a common or generic shape, belonging to all individuals of the same class, it came naturally to signify "a model," "pattern," or "exemplar," to which individuals are to be assimilated. Thus we have sutoris forme, Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 106. "Shoemaker's lasts," and formula, "a set form to be observed, or copied." But, though forma be a generic term, it is less comprehensive than figura. This is evident from the following passage; “Corporis nostri magnam natura ipsa videtur habuisse rationem, quæ formam nostram reliquamque figuram—posuit in promptu.” Cic. Off. lib. i. Here the expression reliquam figuram clearly shews, that forma is only a part of figura. The question then is, what does figura comprehend, as applicable to animated forms. The following passage will explain. “Corporis igitur nostri partes, totaque figura, et forma et statura, quam apta ad naturam sit, appareat.” Cic. de fin. lib. v. Here figura is described, as including forma and statura. In connection with the shape, it signifies the height, and the position or attitude of the object. “Figura,” says Asconius Pedianus, “est circa gestum situmque membrorum.” The forma will remain the same, while the figura, including the motus and status, may, as Cicero subsequently observes, be changed, “depravatione, motu, statu deformi, aut si manibus ingrediatur quis, aut non ante, sed retro.” In his work “De natura Deorum,” he remarks that the dispositions are often different, where the formæ are alike: and the figura is frequently not accordant with the disposition; or, if we may be allowed to extend the meaning of the expression to the brute creation, with the moral character. This position he illustrates by the resemblance of the ape to man, adding “at moribus in utroque dispare;” and by the sagacity of the elephant, of whom he says, “At figura quæ vastior,” which expression evidently includes statura, i. e. quantitas corporis stantis.

He then asks, “Inter ipsos homines nonne et similis formis dispare mores, et moribus figura dissimilis?” Forma then means “a shape common to a class,” figura comprehends also its positions, its attitudes, and its various modifications. And generally, every object in nature must have figura, but it may be a unique, and therefore not have forma.

When there is no particular reference to the size, position, or attitude of the object, the two words may be used indiscriminately. A sphere is termed by Cicero figura, and also forma (De nat. Deor. lib. ii.); and the figures of Archimedes have been designated by the names figura and forma.

“*Utque novis fragilis signatur cera figuris,
Nec manet, ut fuerat, nec formas servat easdem.*”

Ov. De Art. Am. xv. 168.

See Ov. Art. Am. 3. 771, where forma would be inadmissible.

The verb Sum, as has been oftener than once observed, must not be joined with an infinitive, unless that infinitive be the nominative to the verb, or supply the place of an accusative case before it.—(See p. 103.) If we intend to express, “I am to read,” we must not say, Ego sum legere, but Ego sum lecturus.

The relative pronoun, which is frequently omitted in English, especially in colloquial and familiar language, must always be expressed in Latin. In English, we may say, “The book you gave me, is a valuable one,” but in Latin we must say, Liber, quem mihi dedisti, est pretiosus. “The books you see are my brother’s,” Libri, quos vides, sunt fratris.

It is common also, in familiar style, not only to suppress the relative, but also to conclude the sentence, or clause, with a preposition, thus, “The city, he had lived in, so many years, was destroyed in one night.” Urbs, in qua tot annos vixerat, una nocte deleta est. “The city, in which he had lived.” The same observation is applicable to interrogatives taken indefinitely, as, “Know you not the fear, I am in?” Nescis, quo in metu sim?

When explaining the distinctive meaning of the verbs accidit, contingit, evenit, it escaped me to remark, that, when the verb of happening is in the preterite or preterpluperfect tense, the subsequent verb, even when it expresses a complete action or event, is seldom or never, I believe, put in the preterite, but in the preter-imperfect tense. In rendering, “It happened, that he fell,” we do not say, Accidit, ut eccliderit; but ut caderet, though the fall was perfect. This, as far as my observation at least extends, is the general practice. “Quare acciderit, ut id suspicarere.” Cic. Ep. Fam. “Accidit, ut subito ille interiret.” Cic. Ep. Fam. “Accidit, ut in furorem incideres.” Ib. “Quibus jam evenit, ut morerentur.” Ib. “Quoniam tecum ut essem non contigit.” Ib. “Siquid tale posset contingere, ut aliquis deus nos tolleret.” Cic. de Am. From the collation, indeed, of a great number of examples, we are inclined to think, that it may be delivered, as a very general rule, that, not only after verbs of happening but others also, when the leading verb is in the preterite, or the pluperfect, tense, the following verb is put in the preterimperfect. “ Nullum adhuc intermisi diem, quin darem.” Cic. ad Att. vii. 15. “ Tantum eximia consulis dignitas valuit, ut omne is flagitium se committere putaret.” Cic. Orat. post reditum. “ Ejusmodi sunt tempestates consecutæ, uti opus necessario intermitteretur.” Cæs. B. G. 3. 29. “ Ita perterritos egerunt, ut non prius desisterent.” Ib. 4. 12. “ Perfecta ab Lucullo hæc sunt omnia, ut urbs fidelissimorum sociorum defenderetur.” Cic. Orat. pro Murena. This seems by far the most general mode of expression. The preterperfect rarely occurs. “ Dissensiones . . . ejusmodi fuerunt, ut non reconciliatione concordiæ, sed internecione civium dijudicatæ sint.” Cic. in Cat. 3. ad fin. When the leading verb is in the present tense, the following verb is put in the preterperfect, if expressing a prior action, or event. “ Non est verisimile, ut Chrysogonus horum literas adamârit.” Cic. Orat. pro Ros. Amer.

Talis, qualis; Tantus, quantus, and such correlative words, are construed like the antecedent Ille, or Is, and the relative Qui. Where the learner is puzzled to know, in what case to put the correlative word, he will discover the proper mode of rendering, by considering how Ille and Qui would be expressed in a similar passage ; thus, “ The book is such a one, as you gave me yesterday,” Liber talis est, qualem mihi heri dedisti, correspondently to, Ille est, quem mihi dedisti. “ Their perseverance was as great, as their fury,” Perseverantia erat tanta, quantus furor, that is, “ Their perseverance was as great, as their fury was great;” where the antecedent agrees with Perseverantia, and the correlative term with Furor. “ You did me such an injury, as you formerly had done me a kindness,” Talem mihi injuriam fecisti, quale prius beneficium contuleras, that is, Eam injuriam under the government of fecisti, and Quod beneficium, the regimen of contuleras. The sentence is literally this, “ You did me an injury of that kind; you had done me formerly a favour of which kind.” “ Debes hoc etiam si tibi curæ, Quantæ conveniat; Munatius.” Hor. Ep. i. 3. 30; i. e. ei curæ, cui, or “ tantæ curæ, quantæ eum esse conveniat.”

EXERCISE.

It happened, that Cyrus, when asleep in his palace, one night, a little before his death, had the following dream:— He thought, he saw a young man advance towards him, of a more venerable than human form, and that he said to him; “ Cyrus, prepare yourself for death, for you are now to leave this world.” When he awoke, believing, that his dissolution was now at hand, he offered sacrifice to Jupiter, and the other immortal gods. While the sacred service was performing, he used the following short prayer;—“ Accept, ye gods, this sacrifice; I thank you for all the favours you have conferred on me; and I beg, that you will grant me such a death, as you have given me a life.”

OBSERVATIONS.

IMPERO.

MANDO.

PRÆCIPIO.

The distinction between Jubere and Imperare, has been already explained. (See p. 106.) Mandare differs from Imperare, as not implying any authority in mandante. It is merely Cuivis gerendum vel pronunciandum aliquid committere; and the term mandatum corresponds very nearly to our English word, “Commission.” Imperare always denotes, that the person commanding is invested with authority. Quintilian says to his son, Mandata tamen tua, fili, perago; that is, “I execute your commissions.” The son had no authority to order, or command, his father, Patri imperare.

Mandamus non recusantibus; Imperamus etiam invitis. Imperamus tum aliis, tum nobismet; Mandamus non nisi aliis. Præcipere, is “To give lessons, or instructions, to another, for the direction of his conduct.”

“It is,” “it was,” and such expressions, are in Latin omitted, unless, when they impart any peculiar emphasis to the expression. Thus, “It is here, you err.” Hic erras, that is, “Here you err.” In the following exercise we consider the full expression to be preferable.

It is to be observed also, that a future time is frequently expressed in English by a present tense—thus, “When I am gone,” Ubi abiero, “When I shall have gone."—" When you teach, I will listen," Ubi tu docebis, ego auscultabo.

When a verb in the active voice governs an accusative with any other case, it must be carefully observed, that, whatever word is in the accusative after the active verb, that, and no other, must be the nominative to it in the passive voice, and the other case remains unchanged, unless the cases be mutually convertible in the active voice, without altering the meaning. Thus, "I give you a book," Librum tibi do; passively, Liber tibi datur. "He told me this," Hoc mihi dixit; passively, "I was told this," Hoc mihi dictum est. "I compare Virgil to Homer," Comparo Virgilium Homero; passively, Virgilius comparatur Homero. In the last example, we can say, Homerus comparatur Virgilio, because actively we may render it, Comparo Homerum Virgilio. "I present you with a book," Dono tibi librum; passively, Liber tibi donatur, or Dono te libro; passively, Tu libro donaris.—This rule is at once simple, and conducive to perspicuity. It is founded, likewise, on the best classical authorities, being conformable to the uniform phraseology of Livy, Sallust, Cæsar, and Cicero.—Of this usage, however, at once elegant and perspicuous, many of our modern Latin writers are chargeable with repeated violations. Thus, "Ut equidem persuasus sim." Xen. Mem. Leun. p. 729. "Me persuaso." Eur. Phœn. King. p. 464. "Persuasus vates mendacia locutus sit." Æd. Tyr. Soph. John. p. 534. "Hoc mirum videtur, persuasderi quosdam potuisse." Xenoph. Mem. Simpson. These, and similar inelegancies, might have been avoided, had the writers attended to this simple rule, that, whatever is put in the accusative case, after the active verb, becomes the nominative to it, in the passive voice, while the other case is retained, under the government of the verb. Thus, "I persuade you to this," or "of this," Persuadeo hoc tibi. Here "the thing" is expressed in the accusative, and "the person," in the dative. The former, therefore, and not the latter, must be the nominative to the verb in the passive voice; thus, Hoc tibi persuadetur, "You are persuaded of this." If we say, "He trusted me with this affair," Hanc rem mihi credidit—and render it passively, "I was trusted with this affair," we must say, Hæc res mihi credita est. "I told you this," Hoc tibi dixi. "You were told this," Hoc tibi dictum est. "The person," in all these examples, being put in the dative case with the active verb, cannot be made the nominative to the verb, in the passive voice.

Does it follow then, that we can in no instance say, Ego dicor, Ille dicitur, or Ille dictus est? By no means. If the person be he, to whom any thing is said, it must always be expressed in the dative case, as in the preceding example; but if the person be he, of whom any thing is said, it may then be made the nominative to the verb.—Thus, "He is said to be a wise man," Ille dicitur esse vir sapiens. Here Ille is the subject spoken of, the person of whom the assertion is made, not the person to whom the thing is told. In like manner, “I believe you,” Credo tibi, that is, “I give credit to what you say;” in the passive voice, Tibi creditur, not Tu crederis. But the latter expression is correct, if used to signify, not that credit is given to the words of the person, but that something is believed of him, as the subject of discourse, as Tu crederis esse vir bonus, “You are believed to be a good man.”

In short, it is to be remembered, that whatever is put in the accusative after the active verb, that, and that only, must, in the same sense of the verb, be the nominative to it in the passive voice. Hence it is, that, if a verb does not govern the accusative in the active voice, it can have no passive, but impersonally.—Thus we say, “I resist you,” Resisto tibi, and, therefore, not Tu resisteris, but Tibi resistitur, “You are resisted,”—the verb being impersonal.—“You hurt me,” Noces mihi. “I am hurt,” Mihi nocetur, not Ego noceor.—For the same reason, we cannot say, Ego possum noceri, “I can be hurt,”—but Mihi noceri potest, that is, Id potest noceri mihi. For the verb being used impersonally in the passive voice, the person cannot be admitted as a nominative, either to the verb itself, or to its governing verb. “Quanquam mihi quidem ipsi nihil jam ab istis noceri potest.” Cic. in Cat. iii. “Though I cannot now in any respect be hurt by them.”

I am aware, that the rule here given concerning such verbs as govern two cases, and that also respecting those verbs, which have not an accusative for their regimen in the active voice, are not uniformly observed by some of the ancient writers. Thus, we find, “Persuasam feminam,” and “Jurejurando persuasus,” in Val. Maximus. “Nihil erat difficile persuadere persuasis mori.” Just. ii. 11. Virgil also, speaking of Cassandra, says, “Haud unquam credita Teucris,” where Cassandra denoting “the person believed,” or, “to whom credit is given,” and which, after the active verb, would be put in the dative case, is made the nominative to the verb in the passive voice. “Triumphatis Spartanis,” is an expression of Justin, ii. 6. Triumphare aliquem, for, “To triumph over any one,” is not found in any author; “Triumphatis Spartanis,” therefore, violates a principle adopted by the best classics, and evidently subservient to perspicuity. These phraseologies, however, very rarely occur even in the inferior prose writers; and, in Livy, Cæsar, Sallust, and perhaps I may add Cicero, not an example is to be found *.

* The following passage, as a proof of a contrary phraseology, is quoted from Cicero. “Atque hanc quidem ille causam sibi ait non attingendæ reipublicæ fuisse, quod cum offendisset populum Atheniensem prope jam desipientem senectute, tum cum nec persuadendo nec cogendo regi posse vidisset, cum persuaderi posse diffideret, cogi fas esse non arbitrabatur.” Ep. Fam. i. 9. When it is considered, that this is, as we believe, the only example, out of hundreds of a contrary phraseology, we are justified in offering any conjecture, which can reconcile it to Cicero’s usual mode of expression. We should be inclined then to assume, that id is understood before posse persuaderi. And what renders this

Nor is the rule here given, and to which the practice of the best classics is strictly conformable, the mere result of arbitrary usage. It contributes, as we have said, to perspicuity.—If Ego credor be employed to signify, not only, that I, as a person speaking, am believed, but also as a person spoken of, obscurity, or ambiguity, must frequently be created.

It has been observed also, that no verb can be regularly used in the passive voice, unless it governs the accusative in the active voice. The practice of the purest classics justifies this observation. The poets are less scrupulous. Thus, Horace says, where the verb regnare, which does not govern the accusative in the active voice, admits a nominative, as a regular passive verb. Tacitus also says, “Gentes regnantur.” Hist. i. 16. The best prose writers never employ this phraseology.

“Bactra regnata Cyro.” Car. iii. 29. 27.

The reader has been informed, that verbs of “Advising,” and, consequently, verbs of “Persuading,” or “Advising with effect,” are followed by ut. Hence Persuadeo, in this sense, is generally followed by the conjunction. But when Persuadere signifies “To probable, is the repetition of the adverb, as if there were a change of construction, instead of et, which would intimate that the verbs posse and cogi had one common subject. In Auctor ad Herennium, we have one incontestable example of a different phraseology, Animus auditoris persuasus videtur; but this form of expression cannot be recommended to imitation.

persuade," or "To convince," it is better, for the sake of perspicuity, to join it with the infinitive mood. Thus, if we say, "He persuaded me to be," it is rendered, Mihi persuasit, ut essem. "He persuaded me, that I was," Mihi persuasit, me esse. "I could never be persuaded to take," Mihi nunquam persuaderi potuit, ut sumerem. "I could never be convinced, that I took," Me sumpsisse. An attention to this admonition, will very frequently prevent ambiguity.

EXERCISE.

After this he sent for his sons, and thus addressed them: "My life is now drawing to a close; but I hope, that I shall live hereafter, and be happy. I never suffered myself to be persuaded, that the soul lives, as long as it is in the body, and dies, when it quits it. Nothing resembles death, more than sleep; yet it is in sleep, that the soul of man clearly shews its own divinity. With regard to my body, when I am dead, I charge you to inclose it, neither in gold nor silver, but to restore it to the earth, the common mother of us all. Farewell, my sons; farewell, all ye friends." When he had said this, he covered his head, and soon afterward breathed his last.

OBSERVATIONS.

SECURUS.

TUTUS.

SALVUS.

SOSPES.

INCOLUMIS.

Securus, i. e. Sine cura, means "Fearless," or "Free from apprehension of danger," "Regardless," or "Free from concern."

“ Cum mare compositum est, securus navita cessat.”

Ov. De Art. Am. lib. iii. 259.

“ The sailor secure, or thinking himself safe, rests.”

“ —Et nitido securum cominus hostem Ense petens.”

Ov. Met. xii. 129.

“ Clam ferro incautum superat securus amorum

Germanæ.”

Virg. AEn. i. 354.

“ Regardless of the love of his sister.”

Tutus means “ Absolutely safe,” or “ free from danger.” Thus, we may say of a person in danger, but not aware of it, Securus est, sed non tutus, “ He is secure, or not apprehensive of danger, but not safe.”

“ Fluctibus ejectum tuta statione recepi.”

Ov. Ep. vii. 89.

“ In a station safe,” or “ free from danger.”

Salvus, means “ Safe,” “ unhurt,” “ in good health.”—“ Salvum gaudeo te advenire.” Plaut. Curc. ii. 3. 27. “ Salvus sis adolescens.” Plaut. Pers. iv. 4. 30. It is applied also to inanimate things, as “ Fide salva.” Cic. that is, Fide servata vel illæsa. “ Honour being safe.”—“ Salvis legibus.” Id. “ Salvis AUSPICIIS.” Id.

As Tutus signifies “ Safe,” or “ Free from danger,” so Sospes means “ Safe,” or “ Free from harm,” whether in relation to past, or future dangers, though most commonly applied to the latter, to which, indeed, Dumesnil seems to me, rather improperly to confine it.

“ Sensim superattolle limen pedes nova nupta ; sospes Iter incipe hoc.” Plaut. Cas. iv. 4. 1, 2.

“ Commence this journey safe, or free from harm.”

“ —Venusinæ Plectantur silvæ, te sospite.”
Hor. Car. i. 28. 26.

“ Let the Venusian woods suffer, you being free from harm.”

“ Ipse quidem per me tutus sospesque fuisses.”
Ov. Ep. vi. 147.

“ As to me, your should have been safe and unhurt, or free from danger, and free from harm.”

In the following passages, it clearly alludes to past dangers, implying an escape from them, without harm, or injury.—“ Altera mater sospiti filio obviam facta in complexu exspiravit.” Val. Max. ix. 12. 2, “ Having escaped safe, or unhurt, from the destructive calamity,” at Lake Thrasymene.

“ Sume Mæcenas cyathos amici Sospitis centum.” Hor. Car. iii. 8. 13.

Here the poet alludes to his escape from the danger, to which he was exposed, by the fall of the tree.—See Ode xiii. lib. 2.

“ Virginum matres juvenumque nuper Sospitum.” Hor. Car. iii. 14. 9.

“ Of the youths lately returned safe, or unhurt, from the Spanish war.”

Incolumis seems to have, strictly, no necessary reference to the existence of any evil or danger. It denotes, “safe,” or “alive,” opposed to “extinct;” also, “whole and sound,” opposed to “impaired,” as

“ Incolumi nam te ferrea semper erunt.”

Suet. in Vit. Tib. Ner. cap. 28.

“ You being ‘safe,’ or ‘alive,’ alluding also to his power being unimpaired.”

“ Incolumem detestata mortuum laudibus extulit.”

Suet. in Vit. Oth. cap. 12.

—“ Rege incolumi mens omnibus una est, Amisso rupere fidem.” Virg. Geor. iv. 212.

Here Incolumi, “alive,” is opposed to Amisso.—So also in the following passage from the same author :

“ Si Turno extincto socios sum accire paratus, Cur non incolumi potius certamina tollo ?”

Virg. Æn. xii. 38, 39.

“ Virtutem incolumem odimus, Sublatam ex oculis quærimus invidi.”

Hor. Car. iii. 24. 31.

Here, also, Incolumem means “safe,” or “alive,” opposed to Sublatam ex oculis, “removed,” or “dead.” “ Saluti fuit, quod, qui desiderabatur, repente comparuit incolumis ac sine injuria.” Suet. in Vit. Aug. cap. 14, “ Suddenly appeared alive, and without injury.”

In the following passages it means, “unimpaired” by time, or accident.

“Vel cur his animis incolumes non redeunt genæ.”

“Cheeks, whose beauty is unimpaired by age.”

“In quibus pecunia incolumis reperta thesauri custodiæ restituta est,” Val. Max. i. 1. Ext. 1, “The money found safe, and unimpaired, was restored. “Omne argentum incolumē redigam.” Plaut. Pers. ii. 5. 23.—So also in the following passage from Cicero, “Quam vir dissolutissimus incolumi fortuna pati possit,” Orat. pro Cœlent. “His fortune being safe, or unimpaired.”

The same idea is conveyed by this term in the following passage,

“Munus ob incolumes ille ferebat oves.”

Ov. Fast. ii. 2. 78.

“because the sheep were safe, not lost or diminished in number.” Ulpian uses the expression, “Ædes incolumes,” to signify, “A house not requiring repair,” “uninjured by time, or accident.”—“Eram tuo judicio civis incolumis.” Cic. pro domo.

ASTRUM.

SIDUS.

STELLA.

Astrum is applied to any of the heavenly bodies. Cicero says, “Moveri autem solem, et lunam, et sidera.” De Nat. Deor. and immediately afterwards includes these under the general name of Astra.

Stella properly means, “One of the stars,” whether fixed or erratic, including also the moon.—“Erant autem eæ stellæ, quas nunquam ex hoc loco vidimus, ex quibus erat illa minima, quæ ultima cœlo, citima terris, luce lucebat aliena. (Sciz. Luna.) Stellarum autem globi terrarum magnitudinem facile vincebant."

Cic. Somn. Scip. Here Stella means "A star," or "planet." Sometimes it is taken for Sidus, denoting "A constellation," as "Singulas enim stellæ numeras deos, easque aut belluarum nominè appellas, ut caprum, ut lupum, ut leonem." Id. de Nat. Deor.— "Quorum simul alba nautis Stella refulsit." Hor. Car. i. 12. 28.

Sidus means "A constellation," or "collection of fixed stars." Dumesnil derives it from σὺν ἰδεῖν, "To see together." Varro correctly from Sidere, "To settle," or "to be fixed." Macrobius thus defines Sidera et Stellæ, "Neque enim hic res una gemina appellatione monstratur, ut ensis et gladius, sed sunt stellæ quidem singulares, ut erraticæ quinque et cæteræ, quæ non admixtæ aliis solæ feruntur; sidera vero, quæ in aliquod signum stellarum plurium compositione formantur, ut Aries, Taurus." lib. i. cap. 14. Sidus is sometimes used for Stella.

COMA.	CAPILLUS.	CÆSARIES.	CRINIS.
-------	-----------	-----------	---------

Capillus, quasi Capitis pilus, means "The hair of the head in general;" Coma, "The hair of the head, more or less dressed." The latter is applied also to denote "The wool," or "hair" of animals in general, "as Comæ ovium." Col.—and also, "The leaves" of trees, and "tops, or flowers" of plants, as "Comæ arborum." Hor. Car. iv. 7. 2. "Comæ papavereæ," Orid. "The tops, or flowers, of poppies." Cæsaries, a cædendo, is particularly applied to "The hair of a man's head"—the women, among the Romans, wearing theirs long. We sometimes, however, but very rarely, find it applied to the hair of females. "Cæsariem effusæ nitidam per candida colla." Virg. Georg. iv. 337. Crinis, (a κρίνω,) "Hair plaited, or in tresses."

EXERCISE.

When Ptolemy Euergetes was setting out on his expedition into Syria, his queen, Berenice, who tenderly loved him, fearing the dangers to which he might be exposed, made a vow, to consecrate her hair, in case he should return home safe. The prince returned not only safe, but crowned with victory. Whereupon Berenice, that she might discharge her vow, immediately cut off her hair, and dedicated it to the gods. But it being lost by the negligence of the priests, Ptolemy was much offended, and threatened to punish them for their carelessness. Upon this, Conon of Samos, a celebrated mathematician, gave out, in order to appease the king's anger, that the queen's hair had been taken up to heaven, and converted into a constellation.

OBSERVATIONS.

CUM.	QUANDO.	ECQUANDO.
------	---------	-----------

"Cum," says Dumesnil, "refers to the occasion; and Quando refers to the time." To enable the reader to distinguish the proper use of each, his attention is requested to the following particulars ; 1st. Quando is used interrogatively : Cum is never so employed. If we say, “ When shall I see you ?” we must render it, “ Quando ego te videbo ? ” Plaut. Curc. i. 3. 56— and not, Cum ego te videbo ?

2dly. Quando, being an interrogative, may be used indefinitely ; Cum is never taken indefinitely. “ I cannot even conjecture when, or where, I am to see you.”—“ Quando (not Cum) vel ubi te visurus sim, ne suspicari quidem possum.” Cic. Fam. Ep. lib. iii. 6.

Hence, 3dly, the clause with quando may be the subject of a preceding verb ; the clause with cum cannot—“ I asked him, when he intended to set out,” Quando profecturus esset, quæsivi. The subject of the question is the former clause of the sentence ; and cum would be here inadmissible.

In the following passage, they both occur precisely in the same sense, each referring to a point of time, as the antecedent.

“ Ne minus imperes mihi, quam cum tuus servus fui ;
Apud te habitabo, et quando ibis, una tecum ibo domum.” Plaut. Men. v. 7. 44.

Each member of the sentence would admit either Quando or Cum, the meaning being “ At the time, at which.”

Eequando is distinguished from Quando, by its implying indignation, or contempt, in the speaker. “ Interrogat,” says Noltenius, “ cum increpatione, in- dignatione, vel inquisitione." It is also distinguished from Quando, by its not being taken indefinitely, but always interrogatively.

SUBINDE.

IDEMTIDEM.

Subinde, says Dumesnil, means " Soon afterwards." Idemtidem, " Frequently," or " Pretty often."

This distinction is consonant with the etymology of the terms, but is not justified by universal usage, which, in regard to these words, is much divided. Gifanius asserts that, though Livy, and writers posterior to him, used Subinde for Mox, or Paulo post, " Soon afterwards," the term was never used by Cicero, or writers of an earlier date, in this sense. Drakenborch also observes, as if with some degree of surprise, that Livy uses Idemtidem very often, instead of Subinde, for " Every now and then." Of the accuracy of Gifanius's assertion respecting the usage of Cicero, we have not been able to form a decided opinion. This, however, is certain, that Horace, who may be considered as a contemporary of Cicero, uses Subinde for " soon afterwards," or Mox, thus,

" Si dicet, recte ; primum gaudere ; subinde Praeceptum auriculis hoc instillare memento."

Ep. i. 8. 15.

We know also, that Cæsar and Cicero, as well as Livy, use Idemtidem, for " Every now and then." See Cæs. B. G. ii. 19, also Steph. Thes. in idemtidem.

Noltenius, in opposition to Gifanius, affirms, that the proper, and original signification of Subinde was, “ Soon afterwards,” and that it was not till the time of Quintilian, that it came to be frequently used for Idemtidem. This opinion seems to be better founded. The etymology of the term evidently points to the signification of “ soon afterwards.” When Horace says, “ Sparge subinde,” Sat. ii. 5. 103, it may certainly be rendered, “ Immediately after,” though generally translated “ Every now and then.” In writers Argenteæ ætatis, it is frequently used for Idemtidem; we are inclined, however, to recommend the latter, in preference to subinde, to denote “ every while,” or “ every now and then.”

The verb petere is thus construed, Petere aliquid, “ To ask any thing, in order to receive it.” Petere aliquem, “ To attack any one.” Petere locum, “ To go to a place.” Petere pœnas ab aliquo, “ To take satisfaction,” or “ To inflict punishment on any one.” Petere ab aliquo, “ To request of any one.”

EXERCISE.

Information was given to Cæsar Augustus, that Lucius Cinna was laying snares for his life. He was told, when, where, and how, he meant to attack him. Augustus, having heard this, ordered a meeting of his friends to be called against the day following; and, in the mean time, he passed a very restless night. Groaning every now and then, he uttered to himself various, and discordant expressions. “ What ! ” said he, “ shall I suffer my enemy to walk in security, while I am thus anxious ? Shall he not suffer punishment, who hath determined to take away a life, which has been in vain attacked in so many battles ?” His wife interrupted him, and said ; “ You have hitherto profited nothing by severity ; try now, what effect clemency will produce.”

OBSERVATIONS.

ARBITER.

TESTIS.

Concerning the etymology of the former of these words, lexicographers are not agreed. The most probable opinion is, that it is derived from the obsolete verb Bitere, being compounded of Ar for Ad, and Bitere, “ To go,” in the same way, as we have Arcesso for Adcesso—Arversum for Adversum. The obsolete verb is to be found in Plautus, in the two following passages :

“ Ad patriam ne bitas: dico jam tibi.” Plaut. Merc. ii. 3. 127. “ Fortunatus erit, si illa ad me bitet.” Circ. i. 2. 57.

Noltenius defines Arbiter to be, according to its primitive import, “ Occulte adrepens qui suis oculis videt, suisque auribus audit.” Sine arbitro is, therefore, equivalent to Nemine vel vidente, vel audiente. (Steph.) Hence such expressions as, “ Secretorum omnium arbiter.” Cic. “ The witness of all my secrets,” Qui omnia videt, et audit.

Testis means “ A witness,” chiefly in a cause, or trial, before a court, “ One, who bears testimony.”

INIMICUS.

HOSTIS.

ADVERSARIUS.

Inimicus, i. e. Non amicus, is a man bearing enmity to another individually, that enmity being of a private nature. Hostis is an avowed, and public enemy, either to an individual, as “Attalum, antequam rex essem, hostem meo capiti fuisse meministis.” Curt. lib. viii. cap. 8, or to a people, or party; as “Hostes omnes judicati, qui Antonii sectam secuti sunt.” Cic. Epist. ad Brut. “were judged enemies to their country.” In the latter sense, it may be defined in the words of Raderus, “Qui nobis, vel cui nos publice bellum indicimus.”

Hostis does not necessarily imply that enmity, which is signified by Inimicus. A person may be Hostis, that is, “hostile to our country, or to our party;” but not Inimicus, or at personal enmity with us as individuals. “Multi, qui de castris visundi aut spoliandi gratia processerant, volventes hostilia cadas- vera, amicum alii, pars hospitem reperiebant.” Sall. B. C. ad fin. Here the characters of Amicus and Hostis are represented, as united in the same individual. “Tum rex, quæro itaque, inquit, an vivere velitis non inimici mihi, cuius beneficio victuri estis?” —“Illi nunquam se inimicos ei, sed bello laccessitos hostes fuisse, respondent,” Quint. Curt. lib. vii. cap. 10, that is, “not enemies to him as an individual, but open enemies to his cause.” This is the distinction between Hostis and Inimicus, considered as syn-nymes. The original meaning of hostis is thus explained by Cicero, “Hostis gratiosum aliquando nomen, et sine invidia, nunc vero inimicitias denunciat.” Cic. Off. lib. 1. “Hostis apud majores nostros is dicebatur, quem nunc peregrinum dicimus.” Cic. Off. 1.

Adversarius means “An antagonist,” “A competitor,” “An opponent,” chiefly in controversy, or law suits. It implies, as Hill observes, no fixed enmity. Cicero, speaking of Antony, says, “Ego semper illum hostem appellavi; cum alii adversarium.”

PRIMO.

PRIMUM.

Tursellinus says, that the difference between these two words is, that Primum refers to the order in which things are placed, and that Primo refers to time.—(Tursell. de Part.) In this he differs from A. Gellius, who, though with some degree of doubt, adopts the opinion of Varro—whose words are these, “Aliud est quarto Prætorem fieri et quartum; quod quarto locum adsignificat, ac tres ante factos; quartum tempus adsignificat, ac ter ante factum.”—Tiro Tullius informs us, that when Pompey was about to dedicate a temple to Victory, it became a question, whether it should be written “Consul tertio,” or “tertium,” and that the most learned men of Rome were consulted on the subject. These disagreeing, it was referred to Cicero, who, for fear of offending either of the parties, advised Pompey to write, “Consul tert.” The opinion of Varro, however, is opposed by one of the most ancient inscriptions at Rome, in these words :

“ P. DECIVS, DECHI F. PRIMO. COS. DE SAMNITIBUS TRIUMPHANS SPOLIA EX IIIS CERERI CONSECRAVIT ITERUM ET TERTIO COS.”

A. Gellius too informs us, that Cælius, a very learned man, and also Q. Claudius, adopted this phraseology. If we refer to the use of primo and primum, we find, that general, if not universal, authority, is in favour of primum, as denoting either “in the first place,” or “for the first time,” and primo, as signifying “at first,” or “in the beginning.” “Primum docent esse Deos, deinde quales sint.” Cic. de Nat. Deor. lib. 2. “In the first place, they teach that there are Gods.” “Ibi primum insuevit exercitus populi Romani amare.” Sall. B. C. cap. 11. “There,” or “then for the first time, the army became accustomed.” “Cœpi adversari primo.” Ter. Phor. i. 2. 25. “At first I began to oppose them.” “Primo magis ambitio, quam avaritia, animos hominum vexabat.” Sall. B. C. cap. 10. Here, primo is equivalent to initio, “at first.” “Desidentes primo mores.” Liv. Præf. We recollect no example, in which primum is found in this sense, though primo is often used in the same sense with primum, to denote “in the first place.”

EXERCISE.

Augustus thanked his wife, and immediately sent for Cinna. When he came, Cæsar having removed all witnesses, ordered a chair to be set for Cinna: then addressing him, he thus said, “ In the first place, I request of you not to interrupt me, while I am speaking: when I have done, you shall be allowed to answer for yourself. Though I found you in arms against me, and saw you were my enemy, I spared your life, and granted you your property: this day you are so rich, that even the conquerors envy the conquered. When you were a candidate for the priesthood, I passed by several persons, whose parents had served with me, and gave it to you; yet, though these things are so, you have formed a design against my life.” He said no more; and from that moment he found Cinna one of his warmest, and most faithful friends.

OBSERVATIONS.

AGRESTIS.

RUSTICUS.

Rusticus, according to Dumesnil, means, “ What belongs to the country, or fields.” Agrestis, “ What grows in the country.” Rusticus, says Stephans, means, “ Quod ruris, vel rustici est.” Agrestis, “ quod rusticum est, vel ad agros pertinet.” The former distinction appears to be incorrect, and the latter is somewhat obscure. Rusticus, as we conceive, is opposed to Urbanus, and means, “ What belongs to the country,” as opposed to “ What belongs to the city.”—(See Hor. Sat. ii. 6. 108.) Hence it means, “ Unpolished," "Uncouth," "Clownish," as contradistinguished to "Polite," "Genteel," "Elegant."—"Rustici delinquunt minus quam urbani." Plaut. Merc. iv. 3. 15. "Men living in the country commit fewer faults than those living in the city."—"Urbanis rusticisque prædiis locupletatus." Suet.

Agrestis, as we apprehend its meaning, is opposed not only to Urbanus, but also to Oppidanus, implying, "What belongs to the country," as opposed to "What belongs to the city, (Rome) or to any town or village." Hence it generally implies a greater degree of uncouthness, wildness, and rusticity, than the term Rusticus. The following passages from Cicero seem to justify this explanation: "Hunc hominem ferum atque agrestem fuisse, nunquam eum homine quoquam collocutum esse, nunquam in oppido constitisse." Cic. Orat. pro Rosc. Amer. Here the orator does not say, "In urbe," but "In oppido," implying that his manners and sentiments had not even that civilization, which may be acquired in a provincial town. "Vita autem hæc rustica, quam tu agrestem vocas, parsimoniæ, diligentia, justitia magistra est." Ib. Here "Agrestis" is evidently used as a term of reproach, applied to what Cicero denominates, "Vita rustica," or "A country life." If our conception of the distinction be correct, every person, not an inhabitant of Rome, was named Rusticus, and every person not living either in Rome, or any provincial town or village, Agrestis.

ADJUVARE. AUXILIARI. OPITULARI.

SUCCURRERE. SUBVENIRE.

Of these adjuvare may be considered as the generic term, denoting to assist by any means whatever —thus we have “Adjuvare auxilio,” and “auxiliis.” Liv. “Adjuvare consilio.” Cic. “Adjuvare opera.” Tac. “Adjuvare facultatibus.” Cic. But it differs from the other verbs, as not only signifying “to assist a person,” but also “to forward any operation,” or “promote any effect, moral or physical, good or evil.” “Adjuvabat eorum consilium.” Cæs. B. G. 2. 17. “It strengthened their advice.” “Is, qui non modo non repellit, sed etiam adjuvat injuriam.” Cic. Off. 3. 18. “Promotes the injury.” “Cum C. Marius mœrorem orationis meæ præsens ac sedens multum lacrimis suis adjuvaret.” Cic. de Orat. lib. 2. “Enhanced the sorrow.” “Eam mutationem si tempora adjuvabunt.” Cic. Off. 1. 33. “If the times shall be favourable to that change.” I am not aware of any example, which would justify the use of any of the other verbs in these passages.

“Auxilium,” says Varro, “est ab auctu, quum accesserant, qui adjumento essent alienigenæ.” The noun, with its derivative auxiliari, though they were perhaps at first, as Hill observes, military terms, afterwards acquired a more extended signification, and the verb came to denote “to assist for any purpose, by increasing the power of the agent.” The notion, however, of augmented power in the immediate object of the verb, is not uniformly implied. It sometimes by a metonymy, the disease being put for the patient, denotes "to assist by mitigating the evil." "Ferulam quibusdam morbis auxiliari dicunt medici." Plin. 13. 22. "Nec formidatis auxiliatur aquis." Ov. Ep. ex Ponto, i. 3. 23.

Opitulari is indigentibus opem ferre. Subrenire, and succurrere, i. e. festinanter subvenire, denote "to relieve those, who are in difficulty or embarrassment." These three verbs always imply that the object is in need of assistance, and in this they differ from the other two, which do not necessarily involve this conception. "Majores vestrum, miseriti plebis, decretis suis inopiæ opitulati sunt." Sall. in Cat. "Si subito sit allatum periculum disserimenque patriæ, cui subvenire opitularique possit." Cic. Off. i. 43. "Equites subvenientes periculo exemere." Tac. Ann. 2. 13. "Catilina cum expeditis laborantibus succurrere." Sall. in Cat. cap. 63. We sometimes find succurrere and subvenire in the same member of the sentence. "Succurrit illi Varenus, et laboranti subvenit." Cæs. B. G. 5. 43. "Ran up to his assistance, and came to his relief." Valla remarks that we may say auxilium dare, and also auxilium ferre; not, however, opem dare, but opem ferre.

It is to be observed, that the expressions "One another," "Each other," &c. are elliptical, and that the ellipsis should be supplied, in order to ascertain how the correlative words should be rendered. Thus, "They engaged, and slew one another," Congressi sunt, et alius alium interfecerunt, that is, “They slew, one slew another,” so that Alius is the nominative to Interfecit, understood, “They engaged with each other,” Alter cum altero congressi sunt, that is, “They engaged, one (engaged) with the other,” Alter being the nominative to congressus est understood.—“They gave to each other,” Alter alteri dederunt; that is, “Each gave to the other,” Dederunt, alter alteri dedit. These phraseologies may be varied thus, “They vied with one another,” Inter se certarunt, “They love each other,” Sese mutuo amant. “Brutus and Aruns slew each other,” Brutus et Aruns invicem se occiderunt.

EXERCISE.

When a boar, of huge size, was destroying the cattle on Mount Olympus, and likewise many of the country people, persons were sent, to implore the assistance of the king. Atys, one of the king’s sons, a youth of enterprising spirit, urged his father to let him go, and assist in killing the boar. The king, remembering a dream, in which he saw his son perish by a spear, refused, at first, to permit him to go; reflecting, however, that the tooth of a wild beast was not to be dreaded, so much as the pointed steel, he consented. The youth, accordingly, set out, and while all of them were eagerly intent on slaying the boar, and vying with one another which should be the first to strike him, a spear, rashly darted by one of the country people, missing its aim, pierced the heart of young Atys, and thus realized his father’s dream.

OBSERVATIONS.

FALLIT. FUGIT. PRÆTERIT. LATET.

Me fallit, Me fugit, Me præterit, are equivalent expressions, denoting, “It escapes my notice,” or “my observation.” Latet me and Latet mihi, though they occur in Justin, Pliny, and some other prose writers of inferior name, should be avoided. That one passage occurs in Cicero, and I believe, only one, in which Latet is joined with a case of the person, must be admitted. “Lex populum Romanum latuit.” Cic. pro Sulla. But, this being a solitary passage, and the ancients using the abbreviation P. R. it is impossible to determine, whether the dative, or the accusative, was intended by Cicero. Some accordingly read Populo Romano. One passage also occurs in Varro, in which Latet is joined with an accusative; but this, like one or two other expressions of the same author, may be a deviation from the pure Latinity of the Augustan age. The scholar, studious of elegance, will be careful to avoid every phraseology, which is not sanctioned by unquestionable classical authority.

The junior reader may require to be reminded, that the relative agrees with the antecedent, not only in gender and number, but also in person.—Thus, Ego qui lego, “I who read.” Tu qui scribis, “Thou who writest.” Pater noster qui est, “Our Father who is.” Here the antecedent Pater is the subject spoken of. Pater noster qui es, “ Our Father, who art.” Here Pater is the object spoken to, and the antecedent is the pronoun singular of the second person—thus, O Tu Pater, qui es, “ O Thou, who art.” This rule is violated in the following examples, “ Benedicite Domino omnes aquæ, quæ super cœlos sunt,” Hieron. in Cant. Trium Puerorum. The waters are not the subject spoken of, but the objects addressed. The antecedent, therefore, being Vos, and the relative being of the second person, the verb should be Estis, “ In atriis tuis Jerusalem, Jerusalem quæ ædificatur, ut civitas.” For the reason just now given, it should be Ædificaris.

When a future action is to be expressed, not indefinitely, in regard to its completion, but as perfect, the tense, called the future subjunctive, but more properly the future perfect, should be employed, and not the future of the indicative. Thus, “ You will do a thing very acceptable to me, if you will treat him in such a manner.” “ Pergratum mihi feceris, si ita eum tractaris.” Cic. Fam. Ep. xiii. 71. That is, “ You will have done.” This phraseology is very common in Cicero; and there is a peculiar propriety in marking the completion of the favour, as contemporary with the completion of the action.

EXERCISE.

Cicero greets Servilius—“ My friend from Laodicea, I value more since my departure; because I have, in many things, experienced him to be a grateful man. It was, therefore, with no small pleasure, I saw him at Rome : for it cannot have escaped your observation, who have done kindnesses to many persons, that very few are found grateful. You will do me a singular favour, if you will manifest to him your value for me—that is, if you will take him under your patronage, and assist him, as far as you can, consistently with honour, and your own convenience. This will be highly acceptable to me ; and I earnestly entreat you to do it. Farewell."

OBSERVATIONS.

ANIMOSUS. FORTIS. STRENUUS.

Animosus, according to Dumesnil, denotes a vigorous temper or disposition of mind; while Fortis denotes the actions, which spring from this temper. Animosus, he says, is the cause, and Fortis the effect; the former belonging to him, who dares; and the latter to him, who executes. Strenuus he explains, as denoting "active and brave." The distinction here given between animosus and fortis, is somewhat incorrect; for the latter, so far from being confined to action, very often, and especially, as Hill observes, when coupled with strenuus, denotes the mere sentiment of courage—the temper, and not the conduct. Some critics have considered Fortis as a modification of the general attribute implied by Animosus.—But, if these two terms bore one to the other, either the relation of cause to effect, or of genus to species, would there not be an impropriety in saying, Fortis et animosus, and also Animosus et fortis? Yet both these expressions occur in classic writers, “ Rebus angustis, animosus atque, Fortis appare.” Hor. Car. ii. 10. 21.

“ Videremus quid esset fortis et animosi viri.” Cic. Tusc. Quæst. lib. 2.

Perhaps the distinction may be explained thus; Animosus is an attribute of the soul; fortis, strictly, is an attribute of body, denoting “ strength and firmness.” Its primitive meaning may be seen in such expressions as “ Reddes forte latus.” Hor. Ep. i. 7. 25. “ Pascit fortis juvencos.” Virg. Georg. iii. 50. Its figurative meaning is discoverable in the following expression of Cicero, “ Genus dicendi forte et vehementis.” Cic. de Orat. lib. iii. When used metaphorically and specially, as applied to the mind, it denotes, that vigour of soul, which is denominated either courage, or bravery. Leo est animalium fortissimus, “ The lion is the most courageous of animals.”—“ Adolescens bonus et fortis.” Cic. in Verr. “ A youth good and brave.” Animosus (derived from animus, literally, “ breath,” “ wind,” and hence “ the soul,”) denotes, strictly, “ possessing great spirit.” Its strict and proper signification may be seen in the following expressions, “ Animosi Euri.” Virg. “ Animosus ventos.” Ov. “ Animosum frigus.” Stat. When applied to the mind, it denotes that character of the soul, which is expressed by the English phrase, “ life and spirit." This character forming an essential part of courage, the term is hence frequently used to denote "courageous." This is its special and modified acceptation.

While fortis, therefore, may be defined generally, Validis viribus præditus, and specially, Animi virtute præditus, animosus may be explained, as denoting Animi vehementiam habens; referring to the spirit and ardor of the soul; whereas fortis points chiefly to the strength, and unshaken firmness of the mind.—Strenuus means "active," "full of energy," and, as distinguished from animosus, and fortis, always refers to action, being applied to a person characterised by acts of prowess. Fortis, as a synonyme of animosus, is opposed to timidus; and strenuus, as referring to action, is opposed to ignarus. "Compertum habeo, neque ex ignavo strenuum, neque fortem ex timido, exercitum oratione imperatoris fieri." Sall. B. C. cap. 60.

The English pronoun What, not taken interrogatively, involves both antecedent and relative, as "I believe, what you say," that is, "I believe that, which you say," "Amat, quod tu das." Ter. Eun. iii. 1. 57. "She loves, what (that, which) you give." Amat id, quod tu das.

EXERCISE.

If I had been Cæsar, I would have dealt thus with the king of the Gauls. "Brother," I would have said, "some evil genius raised this war between us; nor has the contest been for life, but for sovereignty. You, to the utmost of your power, shewed yourself a brave and active soldier ; fortune, however, favoured me, and made you a prisoner, from being a king. What happened to you, might have happened to me ; and your disaster reminds us of the instability of all human things. I give you your life ; I give you your liberty ; and I receive you as a friend, instead of an enemy. Henceforth let us vie with each other in good offices ; and let the subject of our contention be, not which of us shall have the more extensive sway, but which of us shall reign with the greater moderation."

OBSERVATIONS.

URERE.

CREMARE.

The former of these verbs denotes simply, "To burn;" the latter, "To burn to ashes."—The former is applied to material and immaterial substances ; the latter to material objects only. Cremare expresses the effect of heat ; Urere the effect of heat or cold. " Nullum desperationis majus indicium esse, quam quod urbes, quod agros suos urerent. Curt. iv. 14.

" Hunc amor, ira quidem communiter urit utrumque."

Hor. Ep. i. 2. 13.

" Uro hominem." Ter. Eun. ii. 2. " I nettle the man." In the two last examples it is applied to the mind. " Pernocant venatores in nive, in montibus uri se patiuntur." Cic. Tusc. ii. 40. Here it denotes " To be pinched with cold." Sometimes it signifies, " To be pinched by pressure."—

" Ut calceus olim

Si pede major crit, subvertet; si minor, uret."

Hor. Ep. i. 10. 43.

“ Omnes collegas suos vivos cremavit.” Val. Max. vi. 3. 2. “ He burned them to ashes.”

GAUDERE.

LÆTARI.

We find sometimes an emotion, or passion, of the mind, and the expression of that emotion, denoted by distinct terms. Thus, Dolor, “ Pain of body,” or “ Grief of mind.” Fletus, Ejulatus, Tristitia, “ The expression of grief, by tears, wailing, sadness of countenance.” Misereor, “ I pity;” Miseror, “ I deplore,” or “ express my pity.” Miserari, says Gifanius, is equivalent to Miserum dicere. Sometimes we find the emotion, and the expression of that emotion, denoted by the same term; thus, Admirari signifies “ to admire,” and also “ to express admiration.” “ Diodoro quid faciam Stoico, &c. quem et admiror, et diligo.” Cic. de Orat. Here is signified, merely, the sentiment of admiration.—“ His ultro arrideo, et eorum ingenia admiror simul.” Ter. Eun. ii. 2. 19. The verb Admirari denotes here an expression of the sentiment, “ I praise their parts,” or “ I express my admiration of their talents.”—Lugere signifies “ to mourn,” or “ grieve for a deceased friend, or relative,” and also “ to wear mourning, as an expression of grief.”—Mærere “ to be deeply affected with grief,” and also “ to express that grief by countenance, or aspect.”

Gaudere denotes “ To feel the calm and rational emotion of joy;”—Lætari, “ to be overjoyed,” or “ to be transported with joy." Cicero ranks Lætitia among the "Perturbationes animi," or "Appetitus vehementiores," (See Tusc. Quæst. lib. 4,) and observes, that Lætitia occasions "Profusam hilaritatem," "Extravagant gaiety," "Intemperate gladness, or mirth." In the following passage, he expresses his disapprobation of this excessive joy. "Atque ut diffidere decet, timere non decet; sic gaudere decet, lætari non decet, quoniam docendi causa a gaudio lætitiam distinguimus." Cie. Tusc. Quæst.

It is to be observed, however, that Lætitia and Lætor do not always denote "Unbecoming triumph," or "Intemperate joy." Cicero himself, speaking of his own deportment, where no censure is intended, says, "Nulla enim re tam lætari soleo, quam meorum officiorum conscientia." Fam. Ep. lib. v. 7.—Lætitia, in like manner, is represented as either moderate, or excessive, thus, "Admiratus rex tanta magnitudine animi oppetere mortem, revocari eos jussit, causam tam effusæ lætitiæ, quum supplicium ante oculos haberent, requirens." Curt. vii. 10.—"Militantium nec indignatio nec lætitia moderata est." Curt. vii. 1. And in the following passage, the excess appears rather to be denoted by the attributives gestiens and nimia, than implied by the term itself, though several critics, it must be acknowledged, have quoted the passage, as an evidence that Lætitia means "Excessive joy." "Cum ratione animus moyetur placide atque constanter, tum illud gaudium dicitur; cum autem inaniter et effuse animus exultat, tum, illa lætitia gestiens vel nimia dici potest." Cic. Tusc. Quæst. lib. 4.

As vehement passions manifest themselves by gestures, countenance, or external actions, Lætor and Lætitia denote not only the feeling, or emotion, but also the expression of joy. A. Gellius defines Lætitia to be "Exultatio animi quædam cum gaudio efferventiore." Lib. ii. cap. 26. "Gaudium," says Noltenius, "est quum animus ratione movetur placide et constanter; Lætitia, quum animus affectum suum prodit per actus externos." Accordingly we find Gaudium, "The emotion of joy," opposed to Luctus, "The passion of grief;" and Lætitia, "Gladness," or "The manifestation of joy," to Tristitia—and Mæror, "Sadness of countenance." "Ex summa lætitia atque lascivia, quæ diurna quies pepererat, repente omnes tristitia invasit." Sall. B. C. cap. 31. "Ita varie per omnem exercitum lætitia, mæror; luctus, atque gaudia agitabantur." Id. B. C. cap. 61.

Gaudere, therefore, appears to be distinguished from Lætari by these two circumstances:—1st. The former always expresses "joy rational and temperate"; the latter, sometimes, "a transport of joy." 2dly, The one denotes the simple emotion; the other the expression of that emotion; and it is this latter circumstance, which seems to constitute the chief distinction.

VIR.

HOMO.

Vir means “A man,” in contradistinction to “A woman,” or “A boy” Vir est, non femina—Vir, non puer. Homo denotes “One of the human species,” as opposed to a being of another species, to one of a superior, or one of an inferior order.—Homo, non deus, “A man, not a God.” Homo, non bellua, “A man, not a brute.” Hence, as denoting merely a being having the form of humanity, homo is used to express “a slave,” or “the lowest of the species.” “Habebamus tunc Cappadocem hominem.” Petron. cap. 63., i. e. Servum. Homo, however, is sometimes used for vir, thus, “Mi homo, et mea mulier.” Plaut. Cist. iv. 2. 57.

Vir, being employed to denote “A man,” not a woman, or a boy, and implying those qualities and properties which constitute the Man, is used, as a term of respect; and hence it often signifies, emphatically, “A hero.”—Homo being applicable to any of the human species indiscriminately, implies no peculiar merit, or excellence, in the individual, to whom it is applied; and is used indifferently for men of any class, or character.

Vavassor observes, that Cicero seems to distinguish between Vir and Homo, but that the difference is more easily illustrated by examples, than explained in words. “Marco Fabio, viro optimo et homine doctissimo, familiarissime utor.” Ep. Fam. ii. 14.

“ Virum bonum et magnum hominum perdidimus.” Ep. ad Att. iv. 6. “ Credo Syrenem dicis, et Polydemum, cum optimos viros, tum doctissimos homines.” De Fin. ii. 119. “ De quo tibi homine hoc spondeo,— probiorem hominem, meliorem virum, pudentiorem esse neminem.” Ep. Fam. vii. 5. “ Catonem meherele hominem, vel potius summum et singularem virum.” De clar. Orat. 135. When they are thus opposed to each other, it may naturally be presumed, that Homo points to the leading characters of the species, feeling, affection, and intellect, as modified by circumstances; Vir, to patience, fortitude, firmness, and energy. The one regards him as a sentient and intelligent, the other as an active, being. “ Non sentire mala,” says Seneca, “ non est hominis; et non ferre non est viri.” Sen. de Cons. ad Polyb. “ Tulit dolorem, ut vir; et ut homo majorem ferre sine causa necessaria noluit,” (Cic. Tusc. Quæst.) that is, “ Marius bore the pain like a man (emphatically), but as a sentient and rational being, he would not bear greater pain, without some necessary cause.” “ Te hortarer, rogaremque ut et hominem te, et virum esse meminisses, id est, ut communem incertumque casum sapienter ferres, et dolori fortiter ac fortunæ resisteres.” Cic. Ep. Fam. v. 17. Here, observes Manutius, “ Ab homine sapientiam, a viro fortitudinem postulat.” Vavassor remarks, that the expression Bonus homo occurs only twice in Cicero; Vir bonus, a thousand times. It may be remarked also, that the latter expression is significant of respect, while bonus vir is generally used ironically, meaning the reverse. “ Ille autem bonus vir nusquam appetet.” Ter. Eun. iv. 3. 18. “ He, good gentleman, is no where to be seen.” We have, indeed, in the same author, “ Ut est ille bonus vir, tria non commutabis verba,” Ter. Ph. iv. 3, 3, where the expression is used respectfully. Some manuscripts, however, have vir bonus.

EXERCISE.

Pyrrhus, having attacked the city of the Argives, was slain in the night time, and was found dead in the streets next morning. Alcyoneus, the son of king Antigonus, having cut off his head, carried it to his father, and threw it down at his feet ; on which Antigonus chid him in severe terms, for rejoicing at the fate of so great a man, unmindful of the instability of all human things. After this he took up the head, and, having restored it to the body of Pyrrhus, caused him to be honourably burned ; and having inclosed his bones in a golden urn, gave them to his son Helenus, to be carried into Epirus.

OBSERVATIONS.

HUMILITAS.

MODESTIA.

Humility, considered as the name of a Christian grace, denotes that lowness of mind, of which we are conscious, when we reflect, what we are, in the eye of our Maker. For this virtue, the Latins had no name ; the term humilitas, implying “ lowness,” as opposed to “ height,” and metaphorically “ meanness,” and “ abjectness.” “ Humilitas,” says Cellarius * , “ altitudini opponitur,” e. g. “ Humilitas navium.” Cæs. B. G. lib. v. “ Humilitas animi, non virtus, sed vitium.” Cellar. de Sign. Barb. “ Sidera inter se altitudine, et humilitate distantia.” Cic. Tusc. Quæst. v. 69. Here it is literally opposed to altitudo. In the following passage, it denotes, metaphorically, “ abjectness,” as opposed to dignity. “ Quis enim erat, qui non videret, humilitatem cum dignitate contendere ?” Cic. pro Rosc. Am. When the term humility is used, as synonymous with modesty, it denotes the absence of pride, vanity, and arrogance, in relation to our fellow creatures. In this sense it may be rendered, though not with strict precision, by modestia; but as the name of a Christian virtue, it is incapable of translation into the Latin language by a single term. Borrichius has, indeed, produced a few examples, in which humilitas is employed as nearly synonymous with modestia; but they are examples of inferior authority, and unworthy of imitation. Castalio, sensible of the impropriety of using humilitas for the Christian virtue “ humility,” employs the term modestia; but this term conveys no idea of that piety, self-abasement, and reverential submission to the Supreme Being, which are expressed by the theological term “ humility.” Submissio animi, an expression adopted by some translators, is equally objectionable.

* See also Vorstius de Lat. merito suspecta.

ABLATIVE ABSOLUTE.

After carefully perusing the observations, which we have already offered, on the ablative absolute, the learner should attend to the following examples: “The king having said these things, the ambassadors departed,” Rege hæc locuto, legati discesserunt. In this example, the Latin exactly corresponds to the English, the verb being deponent, and the signification of its perfect participle, Having spoken. The substantive king, with which the participle agrees, not being the nominative to any verb, or a regimen to any word in the sentence, is, therefore, put in the ablative absolute. It is to be observed, however, as we have just now remarked, that the Latin precisely corresponds to the English, and is a close translation of it. But if, instead of a deponent verb, we employ a passive verb, the meaning of the perfect participle of which is Being, and not Having, the English must be turned, so as to make it tally with the Latin. Thus, “These things being said by the king, the ambassadors departed,” His a rege dictis, legati discesserunt.

Cellarius observes, that a or ab, after a passive verb, does not always signify by, or denote the efficient cause, if the verb in the active voice admit the same preposition after it. Thus, Redimere ab aliquo signifies “To ransom from any one,” as A prædonibus redemerunt, “They ransomed from the robbers;” strictly, therefore, he observes, Redempti a Christo, signifies, “ Redeemed from Christ,” not “ by Christ.”

It may be questioned, whether the meaning of the expression be strictly, what Cellarius affirms; for a, or ab, after a passive verb, is uniformly employed to denote the principal agent; but it cannot be denied, that the expression is ambiguous. Perspicuity, therefore, requires that, in such cases, by and from should be carefully distinguished. For, if we say Pax ab iis petita est, to denote either, “ Peace was asked by them,” or “ Peace was asked from them;” it must be impossible, in many cases, to determine, which is the intended meaning of the expression. Thus also, if we say, Ab iis impetrata est, to signify either, “ from them,” or “ by them,” the context only can determine, which of the two interpretations is to be adopted. To avoid this ambiguity, we should employ a, or ab, after the passive verb, to express the principal agent, and de, e, or ex, for from. Thus, Ab eo quæsitum est, “ It was asked by him,” or, “ He asked.” Ex eo quæsitum est, “ It was inquired of him,” or “ He was asked.” Inattention to this rule has produced, among many others, the following ambiguities. “ Ab Æduis bellum timebatur,” Liv. iii. 15, “ War was feared from, or by the Ædui.” The preposition ex for ab, would have removed the ambiguity. “ Agri a Vols-cis capti.” Liv. iii. 1. “ A quo cum quæreretur.” Cic. Off. ii. 25. “ Abstinebatur a patribus.” Liv. iii. 36. “ A Vejente hoste clades accepta.” Id. ii. 48.

In general, however, the excellent historian from whom chiefly these examples are taken, and also Cicero, Cæsar, and Sallust, carefully attend to this distinction. “In dominos quæri de servis iniquum est.” Cic. pro Rose. Amer. “Oppida capta de Latinis,” Liv. i. 38, “Taken from the Latins.” “Captum ex hostibus,” Liv. ii. 42. “Taken from the enemy.” The reader should uniformly bear in mind, that no authority whatever can justify ambiguity.

EXERCISE.

True wisdom never fails to be accompanied with humility. Certain Ionian young gentlemen having bought from Milesian fishermen a single cast of a net, as soon as the net was drawn on shore, a golden tripod made its appearance. The fishermen affirming, that they had sold only what fishes should be taken, and the young men maintaining, that they had a right to every thing contained in the net, a dispute arose between them, concerning the property of the tripod. To put an end to this dispute, they consulted the oracle at Delphos, who ordered it to be given to the wisest man in Greece. They gave it, therefore, to Thales, he to Bias; and, having gone through the other wise men of Greece, it came at last to Solon; who saying, that God only excelled in wisdom, advised it to be sent to the oracle of Apollo.

OBSERVATIONS.

In the Latin language, the distinction between the active and the passive voice is, by prose writers, strictly observed, but in English the former is frequently employed for the latter. This idiom deserves attention. We say, for example, “The grass cuts easily.” “The wine drinks harsh.” “The cloth soon tears.” In these examples, the verb evidently has a passive signification; for the subject is neither active nor neuter, but clearly acted upon. If I say, “He delights in reading,” the verb has evidently a passive meaning, under an active form. Its nominative does not act; but is, on the contrary, acted upon. Accordingly, in Latin, we find either the passive verb employed, as Delectatur legendo, “He is delighted with reading,” or, if the active verb be used, the person is still represented as receiving the action of the verb (verbi transitus) as Delectat cum legere, “He delights to read,” “He is delighted with reading,” and, literally, “To read delights him.”

It is remarked by Mr. Pickbourn, in his dissertation on the English verb, that the use of the form amatus fui for the preterite passive is very uncommon, and that, though it cannot be pronounced ungrammatical, the form amatus sum is far preferable. He states that, “after reading a great part of Victor, Eutropius, Nepos, Justin, Cæsar, Sallust, Cicero’s Orations, Phædrus, Ovid’s Metamorphoses and Tristia, Virgil, Horace, Terence, and Juvenal, he was able to collect only three-and-twenty instances of fuit being joined to a perfect participle.” Our attention was drawn to this subject by Mr. Pickbourn’s Dissertation, which we perused immediately after its publication; and we have found, in the course of our reading, that a combination of the perfect participle with fuit very rarely occurs. It would seem also, that in several of those examples (we will not say in all) in which it does occur, the predicate has the character of a participial or adjective, rather than of a participle. The fact, here stated, deserves the attention of the junior reader, as all our grammars might lead him to conclude, that est and fuit, when joined to the participle, are, if equivalent expressions, of equal authority. When not the completion of an action, but a habit, or continued effect, is implied, fuit may be used, but erat is by far more common.

EXERCISE.

Cambyses, king of Persia, was immoderately addicted to drinking. Præxaspes, one of his dearest friends, advised him to drink more sparingly, saying, that drunkenness was shameful in a king. Cambyses replied, “ I will immediately shew you, that, after drinking, my hands and eyes can do their duty.” He then drank more freely, than on other occasions; and being intoxicated, he ordered Præxaspes’s son to stand at a distance, with his left hand raised above his head. Then he bent his bow, and pierced the heart of the youth, asking his father, at the same time, if he had a steady enough hand. Such was the cruelty of this monster. The man, who delights in the misery of others, is unworthy of life.

OBSERVATIONS.

PECUNIA.

NUMMUS.

Servius says, that Pecunia is derived from Pecus, because all wealth originally consisted in cattle. “ Omnis pecuniæ pecus fundamentum,” says Varro.

Columella delivers the same opinion. “ Itaque sicut veteres Romani præceperunt, ipse quoque censeo tam pecorum quam agrorum cultum pernoscere ; nam in rusticatione, vel antiquissima ratio est pascendi, eademque quæstuosissima. Propter quod nomina quoque et pecuniae et peculii tracta videntur a pecore, quoniam id solum veteres possederunt.” Col. lib. vi. Pliny adopts a different ground of derivation. He says, that Pecunia was so called, because it was stamped with the figures of sheep and oxen—that Servius Tullius was the first of the Romans that stamped it—and that their original coin consisted only of brass. He tells us further, that silver was stamped in the year of the city 484, five years before the first Punic war, and gold sixty-two years afterwards. Plutarch, in his Life of Poplicola, says, that ancient coins were marked with the figure of a sheep, a sow, or an ox. Aristotle likewise observes, that the Reginians marked their coin with the figure of a hare—the Cephallenians with that of a horse—the Argives with a mouse, and sometimes a wolf.

Nummus, according to some writers, is derived from Numa, who is reported by Suidas, to have been the first of the Roman kings that introduced money made of brass ; which, before his time, consisted of shells only, or leather—Suetonius, I believe, adopts this opinion. Others, with more probability, derive it from Nóμος, Lex, as Numisma is derived from Nóμισμα, because the use of money, instead of exchange by barter, was established by law. Lampr-dius seems to apply Pecunia to copper money only. He says, in his Life of Severus, “ Nunquam aurum, nunquam argentum, vix pecuniam donavit.”

The distinction, however, between Pecunia and Nummus appears rather to be, that Pecunia means, “ any property,” whether consisting of slaves, cattle, lands, houses, money, or any moveable effects—whereas Nummus always refers to “ Coin,” or “ Stamped money.” “ Ad extremum pecunia, quo uno nomine continentur omnia, quorum jure domini sumus.” August. de l. arb. i. 15. “ Pecuniæ nomine non solum numerata pecunia, sed omnes res, tam soli, quam mobiles, et tam corpora, quam jura.” Ulp. “ Hoc posito, hæc jura pontificum auctoritatis consecutæ sunt, ne morte patrisfamilias sacrorum memoria occideret, et ut iis essent ea adjuncta, ad quos ejusdem morte pecunia venerit.” Cic. de Leg. ii. 48, “ Si magna pars pecuniæ legata est.” Ib. ii. 49. In these passages, it seems to denote chiefly moveable property. “ Amplissimæ pecuniæ fit dominus.” Cic. Orat. pro Rosc. Am. “ He becomes the proprietor of a very large fortune.” Here it denotes property of any kind whatever—chiefly, however, what we term landed property, with its appurtenances. So also, in the following passages, “ In hac enim causa cum viderent, illos amplissimam pecuniam possidere, hunc in summa mendicitate esse.” Cic. pro Rosc. Am. “ Hoc cuiquam ferendum putas esse, nos ita vivere in pecunia tenui ?” Cic. Orat. in Ver. “ That we should thus live in narrow circumstances," or "with a scanty fortune?" It is generally used in a more limited sense, as equivalent to nummi.

Pecuniosus and Locuples are thus distinguished by Cicero, agreeably to their original import, " Multaque ditione ovium et boum, quod tunc erat res in pecore, et in locorum possessionibus, ex quo pecuniosi et locupletes vocabantur." Cic. Frag.

Nummus, as has been observed, denotes coin. "Si sapiens adulterinos nummos acceperit," Cic. de Off. "Counterfeit money." "Sed nunc omnia ista jacere puto propter nummorum caritatem." Cic. Ep. ad Att. ix. 11. "On account of the scarcity of money."

Pecunia, if used for money, implies, uniformly, money in general; Nummus often denotes one particular piece of money, generally, the Sestertius, i. e. Semistertius marked LLS or HS, equal to two pounds and a half of brass, (duobus assibus cum tertio semisse,) or to the fourth part of a Denarius. The Sestertius was a silver coin, and was equal, in our money, to one penny, three farthings, and three-fourths of a farthing.

It may be here remarked, for the information of the junior reader, that pecunia is sometimes suppressed. "Quoniam collectam, Crasse, a conviva exigis." Cic. de Orat. "Tres aureos accipiat absque sua pulveratica." Const. Theod. and Valent. "Pecunia pulveratica," was the money given to servants, when they went to war.

It is very common in English, when reflex action is implied, that is, when the person, or thing, acting, is likewise acted upon, to suppress the pronoun after the verb. In this sense, English verbs are considered by Johnson as neuter. Here he appears to err ; for, surely the verb is not the less active, because the action is not transitive, but confined to the agent. In French, active verbs thus employed are called “Reflex verbs,” and in that language, as in Latin, unless among the poets, the pronoun after the verb is very generally expressed ; after some verbs, indeed, it is never omitted. We say, in English, either, “He behaves,” or “He behaves himself ;” but, in Latin, we must say, Sese gerit. In English we say, “He turned himself away from the sight,” or “He turned away from the sight ;” but, in Latin, we must say, A speculo sese avertit. In the same manner, if the English verb be intransitive, and the Latin verb transitive, the pronoun must be expressed after the verb—thus, “They interfered,” Illi sese interposuerunt, that is, “They interposed themselves.” Among the poets, the pronoun is frequently omitted—thus, “Jam nox humida cœlo præcipitat.” Virg. for Præcipitat se. “Volventibus annis.” Virg. i. e. Sese volventibus. Sometimes, in prose, we find the active verb used reflexively, without the pronoun—thus, “Multi jam menses transierant, et hyems jam præcipitaverat.” Cæs. B. G. iii. 25. “Nilus præcipitat ex altissimis montibus.” Cic. in Somn. Scip. “Terror paulatim totus vertere in plebem cœpit.” i. e. Vertere se, or Verti. Liv. iii. 36. It is necessary, however, to admonish the scholar, never to employ the active verb in this manner, unless warranted by unexceptionable authority.

It has been already observed, that Homo, denoting any one of the human species, whether man, woman, or child, expresses no peculiar excellency of any individual of that species, and that Vir, on the contrary, implies a pre-eminence. “Monebat (Alexander) quemadmodum Dario majorem turbam hominum esse, sic virorum sibi,” Just. xi. 3, “He admonished them to consider, that as Darius had a greater number of persons, so he had a greater number of men.” Hence homo is sometimes used contemptuously, and may be employed to express the ideas annexed to the English term “fellow,” when used in a disrespectful sense.

EXERCISE.

A certain maid-servant had received a sum of money from two strangers, on this condition, that she should not restore it, unless both of them were present. Some time afterwards, one of them returned to her; and pretending, that his companion was dead, carried off the money. Afterwards came the other also, and demanded it. The poor girl was at a loss, what to do; having neither money, nor friends to defend her, she was actually reduced to that state of despair, as even to think of putting an end to her existence. Demosthenes, having heard the affair, interposed in her behalf, and said to the man; “The woman is ready to return the money, but unless you bring your companion, she cannot do it, consistently with her engagement.” On this the fellow went away.

OBSERVATIONS.

ORTUS.

ORIUNDUS.

Valla and Noltenius have observed, that Oriundus is construed differently from Ortus, that the former is joined, 1st. To the ablative, with the prepositions A, or Ab, as A Roma oriundus: 2dly. Without a preposition, as Oriundum Alba sacerdotium: 3dly. To adverbs, Inde est oriundus, unde tui majores; and that Ortus takes only the genitive of the names of towns, or the ablative, if they be of the third declension, or plural number. With greater propriety they might have said, that the place of nativity is not governed, in any instance, by Ortus, as it is by Oriundus—thus, we say, Romā oriundus, but Romæ ortus. The latter expression means, “born at Rome.”

Ortus and Oriundus are thus distinguished, in regard to meaning, by Noltenius, and some other critics. Ortus, they say, respects the circumstances of our own birth; this is the opinion of Noltenius: and Oriundus regards those of our ancestors. “Nati Carthagine, sed oriundi a Syracusis.” Liv. xxiv. 6. To shew that this distinction is not uniformly attended to, Fornerius quotes the two following passages, “Qui ab ingenuis oriundi sunt.” Cic. Top. cap. vi. “Denique cœlesti sumus omnes semine oriundi.” Lucr. ii. 989. These two passages do not appear to me to overthrow this distinction; and I am inclined to believe, that, while Ortus refers to one’s more immediate ancestors, Oriundus refers to the origin of the family.

The following phrases deserve attention: “He was on the point of being ruined,” Fere in eo erat, ut periret, i. e. “He was almost in that situation, that he was ruined,” or Parum absuit, quin periret. Non multum absuit, quin periret, “He was far from being ruined,” Multum absuit, ut periret. “We are so far from being unwilling, that any thing should be written against us, that we even much wish it,” “Tantum abest, ut scribi contra nos nolimus, ut id etiam maxime optemus.” Cic. “You were so far from inflaming our minds,” “Tantum absuit, ut inflammare animos nostros.” Cic.

EXERCISE.

Dionysius, being charmed with the character of Plato, expressed a great desire to see him. The philosopher, then about forty years of age, paid the tyrant a visit. But the king being displeased with the freedom of his conversation on the subject of monarchy, Plato was on the point of being put to death; his friends, however, Dion and Aristomenes, pleaded his cause; and, at their intercession, the tyrant spared his life, but delivered him to one Potidius, to be sold as a slave. This man, accordingly, transported him to Aegina; and happy was it for Plato, that one Anniceres, a native of Cyrene, was in the island at the time; for he paid the sum which Potidius demanded, and sent the philosopher back to Athens.

OBSERVATIONS.

In for “ Into,” governs the accusative; for “ In,” it is joined to the ablative. To this rule there are a few exceptions—thus, “ To give in marriage,” “ Dare in matrimonium.” Cic. “ Collocare in matrimonium.” Cæs. “ To speak in praise,” “ Dicere in laudem.” Aul. Gell. “ To succeed in the room of any one,” “ Alicui in locum succedere.” Liv. “ To substitute in the room,” “ Sufficere in locum.” Liv. “ In future,” “ In futurum.” “ To be in friendship,” “ In amicitiam esse,” Cic. Verr. more commonly in the ablative. “ To speak in blame of any one,” “ In culpam dicere.” Aul. Gell. “ Nearly in these words,” “ In hæc ferme verba.” Liv. xxv. 12. “ In,” or “ after the manner,” “ In modum.” Cic. Liv. Tac. as Mirum in modum, “ In a wonderful manner.” Servilem in modum, “ After the manner of slaves.” In memoriam, “ In memory,” an expression common in epitaphs; but its accuracy has been questioned. The expression “ ad memoriam,” occurs several times in Cicero; and “ in memoriam sempiternam spar gere,” is a phraseology, which we find in his Oratio pro Archia, in which the noun is used in an active sense, and follows a verb denoting motion. In later writers, it occurs frequently in a passive signification. “ Epulumque pronunciavit in filiæ memoriam.” Suet. in Vit. J. Cæs. “ In honour,” In honorem; as, Ponere in honorem, “ To erect in honour.” Vavassor observes, that the phrases, In laudem, In honorem, were never used by Cicero, nor by any writer anterior to him; and that Honoris gratia, Laudis gratia, were employed by the purest and best writers. He observes, further, that the Senecas were the first, who introduced this exceptionable phraseology. That Cicero never employed it, is true: but Vavassor mistakes, when he says, that the Senecas were the first, who introduced it, for we find in Horace, who wrote before their time, “Plurimus in Junonis honorem, Aptum dicit equis Argos.”

Car. i. 7, 8, 9.

It may be here remarked, in passing, that after the verb Succedere, the preposition In is sometimes joined, by modern Latin writers, with the ablative case—thus, Adams says in his Selectæ, “Successit in regno.” The verb Succedere being a verb of motion, signifying “To come up,” if In be used after it, the preposition should be joined with an accusative case. We have a few examples in Cicero, Justin, and I believe, Tacitus, in which the dative of the thing is used, as “Successit regno.” Just. “Successit hæreditati,” Cic.; but it may be safely affirmed, that no good authority can be pleaded for Succedere in regno.

“One of many,” is rendered, in Latin, by unus, unless followed by another, and then it is rendered by alius, as “One of the fingers,” Unus e digitis.—

"One fought, another fled, and all were thrown into confusion," Alius pugnavit, alius fugit; et omnes turbati sunt. One of two is rendered by Alter, as "One of the eyes," Alter oculorum. "One of the hands," Altera manuum, or e manibus. It may be remarked, as some aid to the memory of the scholar, that the pronominal adjectives expressing one of two, end in er—thus,

{ Which of many	Quis.
{ Whether, or which, of two	Uter.
{ One of many	Unus.
{ One of two	Alter.
{ None (of many)	Nullus.
{ Neither (of two)	Neuter.
{ Any (of many)	Quilibet, or Quivis.
{	Quisquam, or Ullus.
{ Either (of two)	Uterlibet, or Utervis.
{ Every one (of many)	Quisque.
{ Each (of two)	Uterque.
{ Whichever (of many)	Quisquis, or Quicunque.
{ Whethersoever (of two)	Utercunque.

Though the pronoun is generally understood, as the nominative to the verb, it must always be expressed, where a contrast is implied, or any emphasis laid upon the subject; as "I read, you write." Ego lego, tu scribis.

There is a figure in grammar, termed jeugma, by which a word is in concord with, or under the government of, the nearest of two or more substantives, or attributives, to which it refers, and, with the necessary change of accidents, is understood to the rest; thus, “Iratus rex est, reginaque non sine causa.” Here iratus agrees with rex the nearest substantive, and changed into irata is understood to regina. “Neque patris misereris, neque auxiliaris.” Here patris is under the government of misereris, and patri is understood to auxiliaris. But it particularly deserves the attention of the reader, that, when nec, nec, aut, aut, or any duplicate of similar particles, is connected with two substantives, verbs, or governing words, they are, as thus connected, considered as having a similar concord, and similar government. If they have not, the jeugma is inadmissible. Thus, we cannot say “Tibi neque nocui, neque juvi,” because the two verbs thus grammatically connected should have a similar power over the word they govern, whereas nocere governs the dative, and juvare the accusative case. We must say, “Neque tibi nocui neque (te) juvi.” We cannot say, “Virgo corrupto vel corpore, vel mente,” but “corrupto vel corpore vel animo,” or “corrupto corpore vel mente,” or “corpore vel mente corrupta.” This is a rule delivered by Valla, and justified, we believe, by classical usage. See Despaut. Com. Gram. p. 218.

EXERCISE.

A certain man, who had two daughters, gave one of them in marriage to a gardener, and the other to a potter. After the expiration of a few months, he went to see the wife of the gardener; and asked her, how she was, and in what situation her affairs were. She answered, that she had all things in abundance, and only prayed the Gods for one thing, namely, that they might have some rain, to water the potherbs. He then paid a visit to the wife of the potter, and put the same question to her. She answered, that she wanted nothing in the world but clear weather, to dry the earthenware. “ If you,” said the father, “ want fair weather, and your sister wish for rain, I know not, what prayer I shall address to the Gods.”

OBSERVATIONS.

CINGERE.

CIRCUMDARE.

These verbs agree in signifying “ to surround ;” but the former implies a closer encircling than the latter, and is used for “ to gird,” or “ to bind tight around.” “ Cinxerat et Graias barbara vitta comas.” Ov. Trist. iv. 4. 78. “ Regio cincta mari, circumdata insulis.” Cic. pro Flac.

Saltus is commonly defined to be “ silva non facile pervia ;” but it signifies also campi spatium, “ a lawn,” or “ open space between woods.” Dumesnil gives it the meaning of “ defile,” in contradistinction to silva, nemus, lucus, “ un defilé, un lieu, où il faut sauter, pour s’en tirer.” In this sense it seems to have been used by Cæsar, in the narrative, whence the following exercise is taken, denoting simply “ a narrow passage.” We find Livy employing it in a similar acceptation, and as synonymous with angustia. “ Sed antequam venias ad eum, intrandæ primæ angustiæ sunt; et aut eâdem, quâ te insinuaveras, retro via repetenda; aut, si ire porro pergas, per alium saltum artiorem (al. altiorem) impeditioremque evadendum."

Liv. ix. 2. Duncan, in his translation of Cæsar, has rendered it by the word "avenue," but not, we apprehend, with sufficient precision.

The Roman foot contained four palmi compressi or “hand-breadths,” equal to sixteen digiti transversi, “finger-breadths;” and like the as was divided into twelve unciae or inches. The passus consisted of five of these feet.

TUMULUS. COLLIS. MONS. JUGUM.

Tumulus, i. e. colliculus, “a hillock,” collis (monticulus) “a little hill,” mons “a hill or mountain;” jugum specially understood, “the top,” or “summit,” but sometimes denoting the hill itself.

DAMNUM.

DETIMENTUM.

Damnum est amissio bonorum, "damage from the loss of a good once possessed," detrimentum, quod fit usu et consumptione, a deterere, is, literally, "injury from use or wear." The former expresses deprivation; the latter deterioration. Thus also deterior is minus bonum a bono; pejor is e malo magis malum. The English word worse, though with some impropriety, is used in both senses; but in strictness of speech, it is inapplicable to a thing, which is not even bad, or which is not chargeable with the attribute in any degree.

The junior reader is requested to refer to p. 59. for the manner, in which the ablative absolute, as it is commonly considered, is sometimes elegantly and precisely rendered.

EXERCISE.

The little hill upon which the enemy were posted, rose from the bottom with an easy ascent. It was almost wholly surrounded by a morass, difficult and obstructive. To this spot the Gauls, confiding in the nature of the ground, and having demolished the bridges, confined their station. They at the same time, by stout detachments guarded the fords and narrow passes of the morass, courageously prepared, if the Romans should attempt to force their way through, to assail them from the higher ground, while entangled in the mud, so that one, who considered only the nearness of the armies, would have supposed, that the enemy were ready to fight on almost equal terms ; but that a person, looking at the inequality of the position, would have discovered all this to be empty pretence, and mere ostentation. Cæsar's soldiers being indignant, that the enemy could stand the sight of them at so short a distance, and calling for battle, Cæsar explains how great loss, and how many brave lives the victory must cost ; and assuring them, that their safety was dearer to him, than his own fame, he led his army back into the camp.

END OF VOL. I.

Lal.Gr
C9453g.2

Crombie, Alexander
Gymnasium; sive, Symbola critica. Ed. 4, rev. & enl.
Vol. 1.

70529

University of Toronto Library

DO NOT REMOVE THE CARD FROM THIS POCKET

Acme Library Card Pocket
LOWE-MARTIN CO. LIMITED

